PREFACE

THE attention of scholars has lately been directed afresh to the subject of the Agapé by the translation of the Canons of Hippolytus, and of The Testament of our Lord, and quite recently, by the publication by Dr Hauler, from the Verona palimpsest, of the Latin Didascalia, and the Egyptian Church Order (Canonum Reliquiæ), of which the one lies behind, and the other is also—but less closely—related to the Apostolic Constitutions.

The present investigation does not claim to have added largely to what was already known on the subject. The Agapé has long been regarded as, if not, like Mary Queen of Scots, “the eternal enigma of history,” at least one of the obscurest of problems, and I do not profess to have solved it. Indeed it is very doubtful if we have the materials for its complete solution even now after these fresh discoveries.

All that has been attempted is to bring together such illustrative sources as are available in heathen and Jewish literature, to pass under review the various references or allusions to the Agapé in the New Testament, and the Fathers, and to compare the extant " Ordinances " on the subject with each other.

This has never, so far as I am aware, been at all fully done before. Bingham's, Binterim's, Drescher's, and T. Harnack's contributions to the subject are all valuable, but none of them have been brought up to date. Even what is here attempted leaves room for a more thoroughly critical account of the matter ; and it is certain to be objected to by some, as following traditional lines of interpretation too closely ; but even so independent a critic of early Christian literature as Dr Rendel Harris has remarked with reason that " catholic traditions have a remarkable way of vindicating themselves."

One of the most important questions in this investigation seems to be what was the determining factor in the apparent variety of early Christian practice with regard to the Agapé. We have to account, e.g., for the silence as to this rite of second-century writers in Rome and Gaul, and the emphasis of second-century or later writers in North Africa, Antioch, and Alexandria. Some take this to support their theory of the original identity—as distinct from mere co-existence—of the Eucharist with the common meals, or the development of the Eucharist out of the common meal. It seems to me that, as I have stated at more length later on, it would not be easy to prove that such silence implies non-existence in the case of a custom, which was so obviously consonant both with Christian teaching, and with Jewish and heathen practice as the Agapé, and in the face of the statements of Tertullian, e.g., as to this and other Christian usages—statements which have an obviously representative ring about them, and which must stand or fall together.

To my mind it is clear that it was the Roman law which to a very large extent regulated Christian practice in this respect, and that this law was administered with varying strictness in different parts of the Empire. But when this has been said, we are still face to face with a very difficult question, viz., the whole relation of early Christianity to the Roman Government. On this subject I have only to add here to what I have said elsewhere (Appendix II.), that such unworthy researches as I have been able to make have tended to confirm the interesting discoveries of Professor W. M. Ramsay. "When Christianity," he¹ says, "established itself amidst an alien society, it did not immediately remake the whole life and manners of its converts. They continued to live in many respects as before; they were characterised by most of the habits, and some of the faults of their old life and of the society in which they lived. . . . Christians were the dominant class in most Phrygian cities after 200. They registered themselves as collegia tenuiorum, and accommodated themselves in all possible ways to the Roman law. Ideas and objects strictly Christian were indicated by terms of ordinary pagan use, or terms unknown to the vulgar. . . . And so we are forced to look for hidden meanings in early Christian epigraphy."

Here we have a clue by which it may be hoped that, as time goes on, more will be discovered as to early Christian social organisation, including the Agapé. In the meantime, as regards the earlier use of the Agapé, I venture to hold rather with Bishop Lightfoot than with those who think that all is quite dark with regard to the relation of the Eucharist to the Agapé up to the middle or latter part of the second century, when there emerges on one side of the picture the liturgical Eucharist, on the other side the Agapé with Eucharistic acts; and further, it seems to me doubtful whether we are justified in correlating the Agapé of the Canons of Hippolytus as closely with the Paschal Supper and the original Eucharist as Dr Achelis does.¹

I regret that the book was in type before I read Dr P. Gardner's Exploratio Evangelica, which it would have been well to have had before one in the earlier part of the investigation. Dr Gardner, like other critical writers, who are disposed to infer rapid accretions upon original Christianity by the method of comparative analysis of other religions, seems not to be fully sensible of the moral cleavage between early Christianity and contemporary heathenism, and even Rabbinical Judaism, but the general tone of his work is worthy of the highest respect.

I have spoken of his—recently modified²—view of the origin of the Eucharist elsewhere (chap. v. p. 161). But as to Mithraism he seems to think

² He formerly thought it possible that St. Paul's ideas about the Eucharist may have been coloured "by the rites carried on at the neighbouring Eleusis" (p. 454). But see below, Appendix I. C.

(p. 335) that M. Foucart, whom I have quoted, is not quite fair to it. The sources of information on this subject are now open to all in Cumont's important work,¹ but it shows how little we know of the details of Mithraism. As Mr F. G. Kenyon has recently pointed out, Mithraism, as an eclectic religion, may have borrowed ceremonies from Christianity, whereas the reverse is chronologically impossible. "We can recognise in Mithraism elements of truth, which account for its temporary success . . . but we cannot see in it a serious and formidable rival to the Truth which is the light of the world."²

Apart from the difficulty of the subject, the little book has suffered from constant interruptions due to various causes; but, in spite of its defects, it is hoped that there may be some interest in an outline which incidentally brings out some important features of early Church life, and puts before the reader materials for forming an independent judgment on the various questions at issue.

INTRODUCTION.

AT the outset of an historical investigation of this kind it seems very important that one should put oneself into the right point of view; that one should try, as far as possible, to reconstruct in imagination the environment—either heathen or Jewish—with which these Christian sacred social meals were surrounded at the time of their institution, and of their early development, and consequently the associations with which they would be connected in the minds both of the earliest Christians, and of subsequent converts to Christianity.

I propose, therefore, by way of introduction, to consider briefly such heathen and Jewish analogues of the Christian Agapé as are known to us, and then to pass on to the more immediate consideration of the history of the subject itself.

I

HEATHEN ANALOGUES.

There is a passage in St Augustine's treatise against Faustus the Manichæan, in which Faustus is represented as seeking to minimise the differences between Christianity and Heathenism; and among other alleged resemblances between the two he speaks¹ of the Christians as having turned the heathen sacrifices into Christian love-feasts.

This statement has been interpreted by some writers as implying that the Christian Agapé had a heathen origin. And, similarly, we find Sedulius,² in the eighth or ninth century, stating in his Commentary on St Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, which probably represents a much earlier tradition, that the custom of the feasts alluded to by St Paul originated in the heathen superstition.

St Augustine's reply to the statement of Faustus tells us nothing as to the original source of the Agapé, but it is interesting as showing the primary object of the feast³ as celebrated in his time. "We have not," he says in effect, "turned their sacrifices into love-feasts, but we have learned the meaning of sacrifice as understood by our Lord when He said 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice.' For our love-feasts feed the poor." And later on he adds:¹ "If our practice appears to be similar in some respects to that of the heathen, as e.g. in the matter of food and drink, its scope and purpose is very different from that of men whose conceptions of God are degraded and false."

There is indeed much in what we know of religious and social custom throughout the Roman Empire in the early days of Christianity to suggest points of contact with the Christian love-meals. It is hardly too much to say that for centuries the countries comprised within the Empire had been gradually becoming "honey-combed" with organizations which involved common meals and close social intercourse. "There² were trade guilds and dramatic guilds, there were athletic clubs, and burial clubs, and dining clubs; there were friendly societies and literary societies and financial societies," indeed, "there was scarcely an object for which men combine now for which they did not combine then."

² Hatch, Bampton Lectures, pp. 26, 27; see also Orelli, Inscr. Latin. 1993, and Index, and the Digest I, 6, 6, etc.

But of all these organizations none seem to have had more hold on the affections and interests of the people than the religious associations.

Comparatively common as these were in the earlier days of Roman and Greek civilization, a phenomenal development of them took place in the first two centuries of the Roman Empire—a period which is practically coincident with the growth of the Christian love-feast.

This development seems to have been largely due to the increasing influence of Oriental religions both in Greece and Rome—to the exclusion of the old national cults.

It would be foreign to my purpose to investigate at any length the causes of this remarkable phenomenon, which had undoubtedly the effect of preparing the way for Christianity, by breaking down in men's minds the idea of the obligation of one national religion. But in order to determine with any approach to certainty the possible points of contact between these associations and the early Christian communities, it is necessary to have some idea of their moral character.

Some modern writers, such, e.g., as M. Renan, have boldly asserted that it was because of their moral superiority and the greater hopes and con-solutions which they afforded that these Oriental systems made such way in the early Roman Empire. "This," he says,¹ "is the explanation of the singular attraction which, about the beginning of the Christian era, drew the populations of the heathen world to the religions of the East. These religions had in them something deeper than those of Greece and Rome: they addressed themselves more fully to the religious sentiment." And of Mithraism, which he considers to have had most prevalence, he goes on to say: "If Christianity had not carried the day, Mithraism would have become the religion of the world. It had its mysterious meetings. . . . It forged a very lasting bond of brotherhood between its initiates: it had a Eucharist—a Supper like the Christian mysteries." . . .²

And elsewhere³ he adds, "the Greek 'Eranoi' or 'Thiasoi' of Athens, Rhodes, of the islands of the Archipelago had been excellent societies for mutual help, credit, assurance in case of fire, piety,

² But cf. Justin M., Apol. i. 66: "The same thing in the mysteries of Mithra also the evil demons imitated and commanded to be done, for bread and a cup of water are placed in the mystic rites for one who is to be initiated." And cf. supra Pref.

honest pleasures. . . . If there still remained in the Greek world a little love, pity, religious morality, it was due to the liberty of such private religions."

When we turn to examine the evidence on which these somewhat exalted claims rest, it appears to be very scanty; and as regards the moral tone of these religious associations they seem to depend on the interpretation of a few inscriptions, of which one or two of those to which M. Renan refers may be taken as examples.

The first is an inscription of the Imperial epoch, the important part of which runs as follows:—

Νόμος ἐραν[ισ]τῶν.

Μη]δενὶ ἐξέστω ἐπ[ιέ]ναι εἰς τὴν σεμνοτάτην σύνοδον τῶν ἐρανιστῶν πρὶν ἂν δοκιμασθῇ εἰ ἔστιν ἀ[γν]ὸς καὶ εὐσεβὴς καὶ ἀγ[αθ]ός· δοκιμαζέτω δὲ ὁ προστατὴς καὶ ὁ ἀρχιερανιστὴς καὶ ὁ γραμματεὺς καὶ οἱ ταμίαι καὶ σύνδικοι.¹

This is referred to by M. Renan² in the above passage in proof of the holiness, piety, and goodness of the members of these religious associations. But, as has been well shown by M. Foucart, ἀγαθὸς is a mere commonplace epithet in laudatory inscriptions used of any benefactor; while εὐσεβής is never used in such documents in the modern sense of piety; and ἄγιος is a mere conjecture in place of the more probable reading ἁγνός, which exactly fits in with the customary requirements previous to the initiation, viz., the offering of sacrifice, and the merely external purity of temporary abstinence from certain enjoyments.¹ Indeed, Plutarch² aptly describes the purificatory rites of such associations as ἀκάθαρτοι καθαρμοί.

The rest of M. Renan's description of the highly moral character of these confraternities seems to be based on an article by M. Wescher in the Revue Théologique,³ in which he speaks of the principle of these associations being liberty, their object the moral and material elevation of mankind; and maintains that their common chest was intended to furnish advances to necessitous members.

On examination this statement appears to rest partly on the above inscription, partly on another restored by M. Rangabé,¹ which dates from about 60 B.C., and the important words of which are as follows :—

Ἔδοξεν μὴ μετέχειν αὐτοὺς πλεόν τοῦ ἐρά[ν]ου, ἐὰν μὴ τινι συμβῇ ἢ διὰ πέ[ν]θος ἢ διὰ ἄ]σθένειαν ἀπολειφθῆναι.

Instead of πένθος, the more commonly accepted restoration, M. Rangabé reads πέναν, and on this the idea of the promotion of mutual assistance is based. But, as M. Foucart has shown,² the assessment in such confraternities was the same for all; there was no distinction between poor and rich, and no “solidarité” between poor and rich. And this rigid enforcement was equally necessary to the existence of the Greek ἔρανοι and the Roman Collegia.

Burial was the only purpose for which advances were made from the common chest.³

On the general influence of the Greek ἔρανοι and θίασοι, M. Foucart’s opinion⁴ is distinctly unfavourable. After an exhaustive examination of the inscriptions and other remains bearing on the subject his verdict is that the effect of these cults and associations was to bring down religion to the eastern type with grosser conceptions and symbols than had prevailed under the state religion, which, as the centre of political life, had necessarily a more elevating tendency.

The best that could be said of them would be a repetition of the ancient description of Aristotle.¹ "Certain associations seem to have no object but pleasure (δι' ἡδονὴν γίγνεσθαι). They have been formed to offer sacrifices and to furnish opportunities in connection with them for recreation (συνουσίας). They honour the gods, and procure for their members rest and enjoyment."

While the state religion of Greece showed a certain approximation to refinement and morality, the vulgar were attracted by the looseness and the disorderly rites connected with the θίασοι; and the effect of these associations, and the cults they represented could hardly be characterized as morally progressive.

When we turn to consider the character and influence of the Roman Collegia and Sodalicia we find that they had many points in common with the corresponding Greek associations. There was the same antiquity of origin, the same rapid development during the early years of the Empire. Their religious character is less marked and definite. They originated more frequently in the natural desire for union and association, and the sense of its value, which was perhaps more strongly marked among the Romans than among any of the nations of antiquity.¹ The *sodalicia*² or religious confraternities were undoubtedly more ancient than the trade or other secular corporations; and, as their name implies, the common meal was their most prominent feature.³ But at Rome the formation of guilds of this kind encountered greater difficulties than elsewhere. From early times they had been regarded with some suspicion, and the patrician feeling was opposed to them, as tending to break down the influence of the idea of the family and the state, as the great centres of society; and under the earlier Emperors repressive enactments against them were frequent, though comparatively ineffectual.¹ Such associations steadily grew in favour, more especially among the people at large, until in the end it became advisable that they should receive official recognition from the state.²

The organization of these societies at Rome itself, and in the parts of the Empire more immediately under the influence of Rome, was marked by that excellence of method and discipline which was so characteristic of the Roman people; and their classifications and divisions present some interesting points of resemblance to those of the Cœnobites and other monastic associations of the Christian Church in the fourth and fifth centuries.³ But when one seeks for anything in the way of possible sources of higher influence on the social life or customs of the early Christians there is no trace of it.

Undoubtedly religion entered largely into these associations, but, as M. Boissier¹ puts it, it is extremely difficult to determine how much reality underlay the appearance of religion, with which these Roman confraternities loved to surround themselves. Whatever the case may have been in earlier times, at the period which is of importance for the purposes of this investigation, though all the religious forms survived, enthusiasm in connection with them had declined, and material interests and worldly pleasures predominated.²

And, lastly, we find that, as in the case of the Greek confraternities, there is little or no trace either of high moral qualification for membership, or of anything like systematic charity or almsgiving in connection with these institutions. Professor Mommsen³ is inclined to think that help was sometimes given to sick or needy members.

M. Renan⁴ gives a fascinating description of what he regards as the exalted character of these gatherings. "They took place on the feast days of the patron (god), and on the anniversaries of certain brethren who had founded benefactions. Every one carried thither his little basket (sportula); one of the brethren in turn furnished the accessories of the feast. The slave who had been enfranchised gave his companions an amphora of good wine. A gentle joy stimulated the festival; it was expressly stipulated that there should be no discussion of the business of the College, so that nothing should disturb the quart d'heure of happiness and rest which these poor people reserved for themselves.¹ Every act of turbulence and every ill-natured word was punished by a fine."²

Here indeed we seem to be face to face with a true Agapé, which the early Christians might well emulate.

But the dry light of facts as shown by fuller consideration of the inscriptions and surviving regulations, tends to dissipate something of the atmosphere of the highest brotherly love which is made to surround the elements of good fellow-

Varro (de Re Rustica, iii. 2, 16) describes the life of the Rome of his day (circa 37 B.C.) as a daily feasting and revel. "Quotus enim quisque est annus quo non videas epulum aut triumphum aut collegia non (?) epulari, quæ nunc innumerabilem incendunt annonam. Sed propter luxuriam, inquit, quodam modo epulum quotidianum est intra januas Romæ." The following inscription (Corpus Inscr. Lat. iii. p. 924) gives a rather different picture from that of Lanuvium. It is from Alburnus in Pannonia, and some thirty years later than that of Lanuvium, viz. A.D. 167:—

"Descriptum et recognitum factum ex libello qui propositus erat Alb(urno) majori ad statione(m) Resculi in quo scriptum erat id quod in(fra) scriptum est."

inscriptions bearing on the subject is of a very different opinion. "Without wishing,"¹ he says, "to diminish the services which these associations have rendered to humanity one is bound to recognise that the good which they have done has not gone beyond certain fixed limits, and above all that it often is only on the surface."² . . . "The fact that slaves were admitted to the membership of these societies is in itself a proof of a certain moral elevation. While taking part in the gatherings, they lost something of the sense of degradation which they were made to feel so painfully in domestic service; but their ordinary condition and treatment does not appear to have been materially improved by these occasional and exceptional privileges, which they were permitted to enjoy."

The name of brotherhood was sometimes used in connection with these associations, but there is little evidence that it was much more than a name. And, as time went on, and the term became common among Christians, we learn from Minucius Felix, that it was a source of ill feeling towards them on the part of the heathen. "Sic nos," he says, "quod invidetis fratres vocamus."¹ And Tertullian² speaks to the same effect. "They are wroth with us, too, because we call each other brethren; for no other reason, as I think, than because among themselves names of consanguinity are assumed in mere pretence of affection (sanguinis nomen de affectione simulatum est). But we are your brethren as well by the law of our common mother Nature, though you are hardly men because brothers so unkind." Indeed nothing will show the essential difference between the pagan and Christian associations better than a few words from the same passage of Tertullian's Apologeticum (chap. 39), the classical passage on the Christian Agapé.

"Our presidents are the men of age and standing amongst us (probati quique seniores), who have gained their distinction not by money but by merit (testimonio). For money counts not in the things of God (neque enim pretio ulla res Dei constat). Even though we have a kind of treasure-chest, it is not made up of *douceurs*¹ as in a religion that has its price. Every man places there a small contribution on one day of the month, or whensoever he will, so he do but will, and so he be but able; for no man is constrained, but contributes willingly. These are, as it were, the deposits of piety. For expenditure is not incurred therefrom upon feasting or drinking, or on disgusting² haunts of gluttony; but for feeding and burying the poor, for boys and girls without fortune and without parents, for old men now confined to the house; for the shipwrecked likewise, and any who are in the mines, or in the islands, or in prison; provided they are (suffering) there for the sake of God's way (sectæ), they become the nurslings³ (alumni) of their creed (confessionis)."

There is no evidence that the pagan associations, good as they were up to a certain point, ever attained to anything like what is described here—even allowing something for the exaggeration of a partisan. There is nothing to show that their funds were regularly employed to give bread to the poor, to educate the orphan, to succour the aged. It was not in the nature of such associations to do so.

And even if Tertullian's statement should not be considered sufficient, it does not stand alone. The heathen Emperor Julian himself attributes the success of Christianity to the care which it takes of the stranger and the poor, and to the fact that "it recommends the priests of its religion to build especially hospitals, and to distribute aid to mendicants of all religious persuasions."¹

It seems clear, then, that the heathen confraternities did not do these things.

As one looks back on this necessarily brief survey of the character and influence of the heathen religious associations and guilds, not only Greek and Roman, but also as influencing both, Oriental, there seems nothing in them to indicate any possibility of direct influence¹ upon or connection with the original Christian love-feasts. Amidst a number of external resemblances and coincidences there is a clearly marked and essential distinction which, even apart from the absence of any traces of historical connection, is enough to cut the ground from any possible hypothesis as to their close relation or interdependence.

But this summary has had another object in view, viz., to show how the social movements and instincts, which these heathen institutions suggest, must have had undoubted effect on the subsequent history, if not on the origin, of the Agapé.

Their tendency would be on the one hand to render the acceptance and development of the Agapé among the Gentile Christians easier; and on the other hand, as we shall see later, to promote some at least of those temptations and occasions of abuse which ultimately proved fatal to what was in its inception a beautiful and intensely characteristic Christian custom.

Social Meals.*

THE evidence of the Old Testament on this subject may seem to have but a comparatively remote bearing on the history of the Agapé; but the general principles which it involves, and the tendencies which it illustrates are so far-reaching that it can hardly be regarded as unimportant for the purposes of this investigation to summarise this evidence, however briefly and inadequately.

The custom of social religious meals appears from the earliest times in connection with sacrifices as, e.g., in Genesis (xxxi. 54), where we read that Jacob offered a sacrifice in the mountain and called his brethren to eat bread. This custom was further developed under the Mosaic Law, not only in connection with the Passover (Deut. xvi. 7), but with the tithe and firstling meals, to which the poor and slaves were directed to be admitted (Deut. xvi. 11). In later days we find Samuel represented as presiding at such a meal (1 Sam.

ix. 12)¹: "The people have a sacrifice to-day in the high place . . . ye shall straightway find him before he go up to the high place to eat; for the people will not eat till he come, because he doth bless the sacrifice; and afterwards they eat that be bidden." In the book of Tobit (ii. 1) we read: "Now when I was come home again, and my wife Anna was restored to me, and my son Tobias in the feast of Pentecost, which is the holy feast of the seven weeks, there was a good dinner prepared for me, and I sat down to eat. And I saw abundance of meat, and I said to my son, Go and bring what poor man soever thou shalt find. . . ."

Religious feasts also came to be associated with family events such as the weaning of children (Gen. xxi. 8), or marriage (Judges xiv. 10), or birthdays (cf. Gen. xl. 20, non-Hebrew), or the receiving or departure of friends (cf. Gen. xxiv. 33; Tobit viii. 20), and to be usual at sheep-shearing, vintage, and at funerals, etc. A detailed description of these may be found in Winer's² Realwörterbuch, ii. p. 182 (see i. p. 319) and the authorities there quoted.

The Israelites were forbidden to attend the heathen sacrificial feasts, partly because this would have implied taking part in the cultus of the gods, partly because they would then have had to partake of unclean sacrificial meats.

The rationale of these common meals of the Israelites, so far as they were sacrificial, is given at length in Dr Robertson Smith's Religion of the Semites,¹ where he mentions that "zēbah and minḥa, sacrifices slain to provide a religious feast, and vegetable oblations presented at the altar make up the sum of the ordinary religious practices of the older Hebrews."

While in the case of the former the whole significance of the rite consists in the act of communion between God and man, the worshipper being allowed to eat of the same holy flesh, of which a part is laid on the altar as "the food of the Deity";² in the case of the minḥa there is nothing of the kind, the whole consecrated offering is regarded as the Lord's, and the worshipper's part in the service is completed as soon as he has made over his gift."³ "In old Israel all slaughter was sacrifice, and a man could never eat beef or mutton except as a religious act, but cereal food had no such sacred associations; as soon as God had received His due of first fruits, the whole domestic store was common." Though this distinction does not seem to have been always clearly observed, it is a valuable clue to the understanding of a difficult subject.

"As early as the time of Samuel we find religious feasts of clans or of towns. . . . The law of the feast was open-handed hospitality;¹ no sacrifice was complete without guests; and portions were freely distributed to rich and poor within the circle of a man's acquaintance. . . ."

"The² ethical significance which thus appertains to the sacrificial meal, viewed as a social act, received particular emphasis from certain ancient customs and ideas connected with eating and drinking. According to antique ideas, those who eat and drink together are by this very act tied to one another by a bond of friendship and mutual obligation." . . . "The act of eating and drinking together is the solemn and stated expression of the fact that all those who share the meal are brethren, and that all the duties of friendship and brotherhood are implicitly acknowledged in their common act."

Without following the writer into the discussion of difficult or disputed points connected with the history of sacrifice or of sacrificial meals, it is enough for our purpose to remark on the deep-seated significance of the traditional custom of sacrificial and common meals among the Hebrews, which this evidence of the Old Testament testifies to.

The survival and development of those ancient traditions in New Testament times would naturally prepare one to expect the facts which the following pages¹ indicate.

JEWISH ANALOGUES.

II

There is a well-known passage in Eusebius,² in which he speaks of Philo and his writings, and mentions especially his treatise "On the Contemplative Life," in which an account is given of the remarkable sect of the Therapeutæ. These "apostolic men of Philo's day, probably sprung from the Hebrews," Eusebius considers to have been Christians, and the progenitors of the "ascetics" of his own day.

² Ecccl. Hist. ii. 17.

And St Jerome¹ seems to have adopted the view of Eusebius without further investigation, and to have regarded the Therapeutæ as closely resembling the monks of his own time.² But there is nothing whatever in the writer's description of the Therapeutæ to suggest the idea of their being Christians. On the contrary, he speaks³ expressly of their being "disciples of Moses," and living "in accordance with his admonitions and precepts." It would be beyond the scope of this investigation to discuss at length the somewhat difficult question of the origin and history of the Therapeutæ.⁴ It is enough to say that Philo himself connects them with the Essenes, though he calls the latter "practical," the former "speculative" in their lives; and that it is generally admitted that the Therapeutæ were Alexandrian Hellenistic Jews, though it is hard to determine whether they formed an organised sect, or were an esoteric circle of "Contemplatives," such as the writer says he found among all nations, but who had had a special "retreat" in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, to which Philo himself was in the habit of retiring.

But Philo's account of their mode of life¹ suggests possible points of contact with the Christian Agapé; and may therefore perhaps be noticed with advantage at this stage of our enquiry.

The Therapeutæ are described as looking upon "the seventh day as one of perfect holiness, and a most complete festival,"² on which they appear to have held a common meal, but one far inferior to that which is described as taking place at the end of seven weeks,³ when they assembled in white garments, and after prayer to God that the entertainment might be acceptable, sat down to meat—the men on the right hand, the women apart on the left. The attendants were not slaves, but freemen, who served voluntarily. The fare was of the simplest—not wine, but only the clearest water, bread, and salt, with hyssop as a relish for invalids. During⁴ the meal a passage of Scripture was read, or explained, or discussed—apparently by the president (chap. x). Then followed hymns or psalms, sung by individuals; then a special course of "that most holy food the leavened bread," with salt and hyssop, out of reverence for "the sacred table, which lies in the holy outer temple." And then the festival was prolonged through the night, two choruses of men and women, each with its chosen leader (chap. xi.), singing together, or in turn, with accompanying dances or gesticulations; the whole closing with a thanksgiving similar, apparently, to the Pass-over Hallel, and with prayer; after which they separated.

Both this entertainment and the common meals of the Essenes, who, as is more commonly known, have also been (wrongly) identified by some with the early Christians, show points of contact with Tertullian's description of the Agapé.

The Essene banquets are mentioned both by Josephus and Philo.¹ The earliest account is in one of the first of Philo's works, Quod Omnis Probus Liber, which is commonly dated at about 20 A.D.

He says: "Their love of man revealed itself in their kindliness, their equality, their fellowship passing all words. For no one had his private house, but shared his dwelling with all; and living as they did in companies (θιάσοις),¹ they threw open their doors to any of their sect who came their way. They had a storehouse, common expenditure, common raiment, common food eaten in Syssitia or common meals. This was made possible by their putting what they had into a common fund, out of which the sick also were supported, when they could not work."

Eusebius in a fragment of Philo, which he quotes, gives a similar description:² "They have no private property, but put all they have into a common fund, and live as members of a θίασος or philosophic company, having common meals."

Josephus has frequent references to the Essenes; and after mention of their sun-worship, describes their common meals in terms that recall those of the Therapeutæ.³ "After this they assemble together to one place, and when they have clothed themselves in white veils they bathe their bodies in cold water. And after this purification is over they meet together in an apartment of their own into which it is not permitted to anyone of another persuasion to enter; and they themselves being pure enter the dining-room as if it were some holy temple, and quietly sit down. Upon which the baker lays them loaves in order, and the cook also brings a single plate of one sort of food, and sets it before everyone of them. But the priest says grace before meat, and it is unlawful to taste of the food before prayer is offered."

"And when they have made their breakfast, he again prays over them. And when they begin, and when they end, they praise God as Him that bestoweth life."

"After which they lay aside their white garments as holy, and betake themselves to their labours again till the evening. Then they return home to supper after the same manner."

When these descriptions are compared with that of the Agapé by Tertullian at the close of the second century A.D., the points of contrast and likeness will become clear.

"Our¹ supper shows its explanation in its name. It is called by the Greek name for love. Whatever outlay it costs, all is gain that is laid out in doing good (pietatis nomine), for it is the needy that we benefit by that entertainment (refrigerio isto). . . . We taste first of prayer to God before we sit down to meat; we eat only what suffices hunger, and drink only what befits such as are chaste. We satisfy appetite (saturantur) as those who remember that even during the night they have to worship God. We converse as those who know that they are in the hearing of their Lord. After water for washing the hands, and the lights have been brought in, every one is called forward to sing praises to God, either from the Holy Scriptures or of his own composing (proprio ingenio). And this is a proof of the measure of the drinking. As we began, so the feast is concluded with prayer. We depart not like a pack of ruffians (cæsionum), nor in gangs of street-walkers (classes discursationum), nor to break out into licentiousness, but with as much regard for our modesty and chastity as if we had been taking in a moral lesson rather than a supper (ut qui non tam cœnam cœnaverint quam disciplinam)."

The points in common¹ between these Therapeutic and Essene banquets and the Christian Agapé are obvious at a glance. There is the same sacred and ceremonial character in all three ; the same studious moderation in food, the same idea of accompanying prayer, and blessing and thanksgiving, and hymn-singing. The Therapeutæ seem to have allowed more ceremonial enthusiasm in singing and dancing. The Essenes had a president,¹ to whom the same name is applied as to the president of the Christian feast by Justin Martyr, and by Tertullian in one or two passages (e.g. de Cor. iii.). But the Jewish elements in the Therapeutic and Essene meals are strongly marked.² They seemed to have dined together because of their anxiety to eat no food but what was ceremonially pure ; whereas the Christians, according to Tertullian, were actuated by charitable and communistic motives. Again, the Therapeutic meals have special features due partly to the monastic character of the society, and partly to their resemblance to the Jewish festivals, features which have, of course, no counterpart in Tertullian's account. And in certain respects there is perhaps more resemblance between these Jewish meals, and those described in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,¹ which is now generally believed to be a strongly Judaising document.²

I PASS next to the consideration of the ordinary Jewish common meals as established in Palestine in the time of our Lord.

Those of the Sadducees seem to have been chiefly, if not exclusively, held among the priests

J. vi. 9, 3). Cœnæ fine panis melior ac frangi facilis ad ferebatur: de eo particulas convivator dividebat convivis: adferebatur et calix, qui et ipse a convivatore libatus ibat in orbem. Addebantur verba Deo gratias agentia quod creasset panem ex terra ac fructum vitis." This is evidently founded on Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica, pp. 308-9 (of Sabbath observances). Cf. Luke xiv. 1, of a Sabbath feast; and Rabbinic Tracts, Orach chajim, No. 273, Minhagim, p. 9. in the Temple, when they ate the flesh of victims which had been previously offered upon the altar. These meals began with ablutions. Then they blessed the bread, the meal, the wine, and the meat. These repasts concluded with a benediction, and the table at which they were held was regarded as a kind of altar.

The Pharisees, though they differed from their opponents the Sadducees in thinking that all the offerings should be burnt on the altar in the Temple, still, in order not to be behind hand, imitated these feasts. "They instituted brotherhoods; they practised ablutions before sitting down to table, and had the viands purified by the benediction pronounced on them."

"Any sort of viands served for these banquets, and everyone was a priest on the occasion, for the table was open to all. It was at one of these gatherings of the brotherhood that the paschal lamb was eaten on the evening of the first day of the Passover."¹

In order to obviate the difficulties caused by large membership of the brotherhood, houses were joined together by beams, so that the whole might be regarded as one dwelling, and all the tables as one gigantic table.¹

A variety of these rules of the Erub, as it was called, was the connection of courts, which was effected by all the inhabitants collecting a certain amount of food before a Sabbath or Holy Day, and putting it in an appointed place, thus showing that they regarded the entire court, and all that belonged to it, as a common whole. But beyond the idea of union which it involves, there does not appear to be very much contact between this latter practice and the Agapé of the early Christians.

The combination for purposes of exclusion which was so strongly marked a characteristic of the Jewish associations stands in marked contrast to Tertullian's subsequent description of the Agapé, "which explains itself by its name" (Apologet. chap. xxxix).

It may be well, before passing from this part of the subject, to refer to the ordinary routine of a Jewish meal as given in the Talmud (Beracoth 43a, 47b, 40b).

On the first entrance of the guests they sit down on chairs, and water is brought them with which they perform ablutions with one hand. With this hand they take the cup when they afterwards bless the wine which they partake of before the meal. Then all recline at table. Again water is brought. This time they wash both hands, as a preparation for the meal, when the blessing is spoken over the bread, and then over the cup, by the chief person at the feast, or by a guest to whom the privilege is accorded. The company respond by saying Amen,¹ provided the benediction has been spoken by an Israelite, and not by a heathen, a slave, or a law-breaker, or an unlettered man, though exception was made in the case of a Cuthæan (i.e. heretic or else Samaritan) who was learned. After dinner the crumbs, if any, were carefully gathered, hands were again washed, and he who had first done so led the prayer of thanksgiving according to a prescribed formula.²

CHAPTER I

THE AGAPÉ IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

IN considering the history of the Agapé in the New Testament we are met by two very serious difficulties at the outset of our enquiry. The first is the scantiness of the references to the Agapé ; the second is the scarcity of materials for forming a sufficiently clear idea of the exact life and practice of the earliest Christians—such, for instance, as would enable us to see plainly the exact relation in which the Agapé stood to the Eucharist.

The best hope of clearing up these difficulties seems to lie in gathering together such indications of the common meals as remain to us in the New Testament, and reading them in the light of subsequent practice as shown, for instance, by the early fathers.

The account given in the Introduction of the customs of the Essenes and Therapeutæ, as well as of the common meals in connection with the Jewish sacrifices and festivals, will have made it plain how thoroughly a common meal was associated in the Jewish mind with religious ideas, and how such meals tended to symbolise a common faith. We should naturally expect to find this idea surviving in the infant Christian community, saturated as it was with Jewish associations. And both our Lord's teaching and practice tend to justify this expectation.

Again and again He uses the image of a supper to symbolise His Kingdom.¹ His miraculous feeding of the multitude, with the connected discourses, presents the same idea in a different form. Not only in connection with the Last Supper, but again and again He is represented as sitting at meat with His disciples—taking His place as Head of the household, which consisted of His immediate followers. His fellowship with His disciples was, in a word, to a large extent a "table-fellowship."

And so, after His Resurrection, St. Luke and ¹ Cf., e.g., Luke xxii. 30, "That ye may eat and drink at my table in my Kingdom." John xiii. 18, "He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me." Luke xiii. 26, "We did eat and drink in thy presence." Cf. also Matt. xv. 26, xi. 19; Acts x. 41; Luke xiv. 15; Rev. iii. 20; 2 Cor. ix. 10, etc.

St. John represent two of His most interesting manifestations of Himself in connection with meals, at which He appears to have been recognised by His manner of breaking bread (Luke xxiv. 30; John xxi. 13).

Accordingly we can understand that, even apart from the memorial¹ of His passion² instituted at the Last Supper, His followers would continue these meals with a conscious recollection of their relations with Him, and of the union constituted by Him. To them—Hebrews as they were by race and tradition—the very common meal itself would, as we have seen (pp. 22, 23), be a religious act.

¹ Since this was written I have seen the remarks of Probst (Liturgie, p. 18): "The religious devotion which sanctified the whole life of the early Christians was connected with these meals. Particularly the effect of the High Priestly Prayer entered in, 'Preserve them in Thy Name that they may be one.' These meals became the κοινωνία or manifestation of the Christian community, and later on received as such the name of love-meals or agapæ. As one among themselves so also should they be one with Christ, and through Him with the Father. . . . As the community increased the daily meal with the daily Eucharist became impossible. . . . And the daily meal changed itself into the Agapé in a narrow sense. It was no longer the ordinary meal to sustain the physical life; this each one took for himself at home; but a meal at which was manifested the Christian κοινωνία. . . . It gave opportunity to feed the poor. . . . It was held in the House Church."

It might, further, under the new dispensation in some sense be a type and evidence of the Kingdom of God (Luke xxii. 30) as existing among them, and ruling and transforming their whole social life.¹

It would then be to the idea of perpetuating the thought of this fellowship with our Lord, rather than merely to a commemoration of the Last Supper,² that I should be disposed to refer

² Bishop Lightfoot (Apost. Fathers, i. p. 386) refers the origin of the Agapé to the commemoration of the Last Supper. Others (cf., e.g., Harnack, Gottesdienst, p. 89) to the Old Testament sacrificial feasts. So also Drescher, de Vet. Christ. Agapis, i., and Grotius, de Can. Admin. p. 22. T. Harnack (Gottesdienst, p. 91) describes the origin of the Agapé as follows:—"The Agapæ developed themselves naturally out of the primitive repasts of the first congregation, and are only a modification of them, taking the altered circumstances into account. They have, like these, a specifically Christian origin under objective and subjective conditions. They are at one and the same time a meal of the love of Christ, and a meal of Christian brotherly love. One aspect is expressed by the name κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, the other by the title ἀγάπη. Both are comprehended in the oldest term κλᾶσις τοῦ ἄρτου. They were most intimately connected with the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Therein they have their justification, basis and object. Their value and worth are entirely in conjunction with it. Separated from it they were of subordinate importance merely, and were therefore, as history shows, bound to disappear gradually." Cf. Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. ii., pt. i., ii. 1. Augusti, Christlichen Archäologie, ii. p. 704 ff.

the origin of the Agapé. No doubt the thought of the Last Supper helped to foster and establish the practice; but it is rather to the central doctrine of Christianity—the doctrine of Love—as associated with the customs of its Founder above mentioned—to that doctrine as embodied in the word Agapé,¹ and as working in Jewish minds already accustomed to constant religious feasts—it is rather to this than to the exclusive commemoration of the Last Supper, which was

On the other hand, the writer of the article in Herzog’s Real Encyklopadie (2nd Ed.) on the Agapé finds its origin in the words τοῦτο ποιεῖτε ὡς ἂν πλῆντε, εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν, “dieses thut, so oft Ihr irgend trinket, zu meinen Gedächtniss,” by which he thinks our Lord meant that henceforth the Supper should be celebrated apart from the Passover feast, yet henceforth it should be united with a meal. . . . This meal, he holds, took place daily, conformably to our Lord’s words, in the early Christian community (1 Cor. xi. 24; Acts ii. 42-6). Cf. Appendix I. c.

founded on a yearly feast like the Passover Supper, that we should refer the origin of the constantly recurring Love Feast.

If the Agapé were intimately associated with the Paschal Supper, one naturally asks why was it celebrated so frequently, and why also did it gradually die out, if it had been enjoined by our Lord Himself, as had been the Eucharistic Feast?

With these few preliminary considerations I proceed to examine more in detail the references and allusions to the Agapé which we find in the New Testament.

The brief and summarised record of the social life of the earliest Christians which we find in the Acts (ii. 42), though not, apparently, composed before the picture presented to us in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, describes the life of the Church at Jerusalem, and therefore calls for notice first.

There is considerable difficulty with regard to this narrative, both because of the possibility of corruption in the text,¹ and because of the difficulty of determining the exact sense of some of the terms used.

teaching, and in the fellowship, in the breaking of bread, and the prayers.”¹

The occurrence here of the expression τῇ κοινωνίᾳ τῇ κλάσει without a connecting particle, and the fact that κοινωνία does not appear to be used absolutely elsewhere in the New Testament,² and that it is rarely so used in classical Greek, is worthy of remark.

If, as with our present knowledge seems inevitable, the reading of the earlier texts be retained, we may adopt the meaning given by Dr Armitage Robinson³ to κοινωνία, viz., that “it is used in relation to the Christian society to express the idea of the fellowship in which it is united, and the acts of fellowship in which the idea is realised”; the Agapé would no doubt be one of those acts; and, though it is not expressly referred to here, ² In Gal. ii. 9, δεξιὰς . . . κοινωνίας is hardly an exception.

³ See Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. Communion. For a full discussion of κοινωνία cf. T. Harnack's Gottesdienst, p. 78 ff. He combats the idea that Acts ii. 42 is a direct description of the service of the first Christians, and interprets κοινωνία by συμβλῶσις, of which the Agapé was one of the expressions. Probst (Liturgie, p. 23) takes κοινωνία to mean the common meal that took place with prayer and διδαχή.

the next words, "the breaking of bread," may have more direct application to it.¹

This expression occurs again in chaps. ii. 46,² xx. 7, 11, xxvii. 35—in all which passages, according to Blass,³ "est sollemnis designatio cœnæ dominicæ." Dr John Lightfoot⁴ in his Commentary on the Acts draws attention to the fact that the Peshitto Syriac translates here by the expression "the bread of the Eucharist," and that the expression "breaking of bread" is very rarely used in the Old Testament⁵ or in Jewish authors

⁵ Cf. Isaiah lviii. 7, where "break bread" (pāras lehem) occurs; also Jer. xvi. 7 (and comments); Lament. iv. 4. It is interesting, in view of the Christian κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου as commemorative of Christ's death, to notice that breaking bread was part of the funeral feast among the Jews; cf. Jer. u.s.; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4; 2 Sam. iii. 35. See Hastings' Dict. Bibl. s.v. Bread. Dr M'Giffert's statement (Apostolic Age, p. 70) that "whenever they ate together, the whole meal was the Lord's Supper" ignores Lightfoot's evidence, and μετὰ τὸ δεῖπνῆσαι (1 Cor. xi. 25); cf. 1 Cor. xi. 34, εἰ τις πεινᾷ ἐν οἴκῳ ἐσθιέτω. Dr Edersheim (The Temple, etc., p. 209) points out that our Lord brake the bread "when he had given thanks" (1 Cor. xi. 24), i.e., that the bread was the Aphikommon or after-dish, just as "the cup of blessing" followed on "the grace after meat"; cf. Beracoth, li. I. In other words, both were at the end of the meal.

for common eating or for a whole meal, but that it is ordinarily applied to the blessing and breaking of bread with which the Jewish feasts began.

Taking all the passages where the expression occurs in the New Testament, one may say that while, on the one hand, it would be impossible to restrict it with certainty to the Eucharist proper, it seems in this passage to include the Eucharist, and what was subsequently known as the Agapé.¹

The account of the common life of the early Christians is further supplemented in Acts ii. 46, "and day by day continuing stedfastly with one accord in the Temple and breaking bread at home (κλῶντές τε κατ'² οἶκον ἄρτον) they did take their food with gladness and singleness of heart," where apparently the idea of that "table-fellowship," which, as we have seen, was so

² Cf. Col. iv. 15, τήν κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἐκκλησίαν, which some think points to places set apart in private houses. Cf. Acts v. 42, ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ καὶ κατ' οἶκον; and xx. 20, δημοσίᾳ καὶ κατ' οἴκους. Binterim sees here evidence of an already established distinction between the private and the public Agapé. Cf. Philo de Plant. Noë (p. 354), μηδὲ οἴκαδε πολλάκις ἀφικόμενοι ἀλλ' ἐν οἷς ἔθυσαν ἱεροῖς διαπατοῦντες of the Jewish feasts of his day sometimes celebrated in private houses. Cf. Acts xx. 8, ἐν τῷ ὑπερφῷ. Cf. marked a feature¹ of the intercourse of our Lord with His disciples, seems to be a prominent symbol of their newly realised oneness in Him, an idea which finds its culmination in the Eucharist.

Passing to the next recorded stage of the community life of the infant Church, I proceed to examine the more detailed notices of this, which appear in the first Epistle to the Corinthians.

We are now, though probably at an interval of not more than twenty-five years, in contact with a very different condition of things. The picture is no longer that of a Jewish Christian community at Jerusalem, making use of the still standing Temple for part of their acts of public worship. We have now to do with a mixed community far away from the dominant traditions of the great spiritual capital of the world, and living in the midst of heathen customs and associations.

And here we find traces of two meetings, not only that which in the Acts is connected with "the breaking of bread and the prayers," and possibly with "the ministry of the word" (Acts vi. 4¹), but a second which seems to have originated in the synagogue, and, like it, to have given "liberty of prophesying," and to have aimed specially at instruction.

This is put before us in 1 Cor. xiv. 23 ff,² ἐὰν οὖν συνέλθῃ ἡ ἐκκλησία ὅλη ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό . . . πάντα πρὸς οἰκοδομὴν γινέσθω . . . δύνασθε γὰρ καθ' ἓνα πάντες προφητεύειν, ἵνα πάντες μανθάνωσιν καὶ πάντες³ παρακαλῶνται . . . ὡς ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῶν ἁγίων.

The other meeting is that described in 1 Cor. xi. 18, 20, 22. It assembled ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ, ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, and included people of varied social condition (1 Cor. xi. 21, xiv. 23), and the meal, as followed by the Eucharist, seems to have been the chief object of the meeting.

² Cf. v. 26, ὅταν συνέρχῃσθε.

³ Cf. the Synagogue, Luke iv. 20, 21; "suffer the word of exhortation" (παρακλήσεως), Heb. xiii. 22; and 1 Cor. xii. 8 ff., "to one is given the word of wisdom," etc.

In considering the passage it may be well to draw attention to what seem to be the key-words, viz., συνερχομένων ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό (which is used throughout the Epistle for the formal assembly of the congregation, e.g. 1 Cor. xi. 17, xi. 18, xi. 20, xi. 33, xi. 34, xiv. 23, xiv. 26); οὐκ ἔστιν . . . φαγεῖν,¹ which corresponds with (ver. 33) συνερχόμενοι εἰς τὸ φαγεῖν, and ἐν τῷ φαγεῖν προλαμβάνει (ver. 21), which corresponds with ἄλλήλους ἐκδέχεσθε (ver. 33).

The practice of assembling for common meals seems without question implied, and the whole assembly is assumed as taking part in it (1 Cor. xi. 18, 20, 33). The common meal would normally culminate in the Eucharist, but abuses of various kinds have to be dealt with by the Apostle.

The first is the σχίσματα leading to αἵρέσεις (vv. 18, 19), and the cause is that, instead of a reverently eaten, religious meal leading up to the commemorative rite, an unseemly scramble takes place, in which each makes haste to take the provisions he has brought, before (προλαμβάνει) it has become possible to make a general¹ distribution of them.

Clearly according to the idea of this institution "all² the provisions should have been put³ together and eaten in common by the whole Church. But selfishness, vanity, sensuality, had prevailed in this usage, and deeply corrupted it. These *Agapæ*⁴ at Corinth had degenerated into something like those feasts of friends in use among the Greeks where men gave themselves up to drinking excesses such as we find sketched in the Symposium of Plato. And what was still graver . . . each was careful to reserve for himself and his friends the meats he had provided; hence it was inevitable that an offensive inequality should appear between the guests, becoming to many of them a source of humiliation, and contrasting absolutely with the spirit of love, of which such a feast should have been the symbol."

And there further resulted a second abuse, viz.,

¹ Cf. Xenophon, Memorabilia, iii. 14, quoted in Appendix I. c.

³ Like the ἔρως to which the Corinthians would have been accustomed. Cf. the Spartan συσσίτια.

that, in this state of things a true *Lord's*¹ supper became impossible. If the commemorative rite was not altogether given up, it was grossly neglected. The² feeling for it was lost, the order probably thrown into confusion; so much so that St Paul has to remind his converts of the very Institution and formula of the rite. And the degeneracy seems to him so serious that he regards the prevailing sickness, and possibly even mortality³ in the Church as a punishment for it.

The remedies he enjoins are that the meal itself should be thoroughly social, and that whosoever was too hungry to wait for the others should satisfy his hunger at home.⁴ And then should follow the becoming celebration of the Lord's Supper at which everyone would be duly conscious of the difference between it and ordinary eating and drinking, proclaiming the Lord's death by taking part in this formal act of worship.

³ Κοιμῶνται.

In the difficulties with which St Paul had to contend, as here described, we find what are commonly believed to be the earliest known reasons for the eventual ¹ separation of the Agapé from the Eucharist.

And these difficulties and abuses are further emphasized in the later and express references to the Agapé² in the Epistle of St Jude, and the Second Epistle of St Peter. "These are they who are hidden rocks (σπιλάδες) in your love-feasts (ἀγάπαις) when they feast with you (συνευχούμενοι), feeding (ποιμαίνοντες) themselves without fear"³ (Jude 12). Or as the writer of the Second Epistle of Peter, who seems indebted to Jude,⁴ puts it, "men that count it pleasure to revel in the daytime

² The word Agapé is, of course, not expressly applied to the customs mentioned in the Acts and I Corinthians, but the common identification of these feasts with the above seems well grounded. See e.g. the next note; and cf. I Pet. v. 14, ἐν φιλήματι ἀγάπης. See further Appendix i. ad fin.

revelling in their love-feasts (ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις αὐτῶν)¹
while they feast with you (συνευωχούμενοι)."²

¹ So R.V. Ἀπάταις has better external authority (see Tischendorf in loco and Scrivener, Introduction (third edition, p. 646), but the context (in spite of αὐτῶν), the similarity of both passages, and the reading by C of ἀπάταις in both cases, point to an early corruption of the text. In any case the allusion to love-feasts seems undoubted. Bishop Lightfoot (Ignat. Smyrn. p. 1001) calls ἀπάταις "an obvious error."

CHAPTER II

THE AGAPÉ IN THE SECOND CENTURY

THE separation of the Agapé from the Eucharist, which has been indicated in the last chapter, does not appear¹ to have taken effect during the Apostolic Age, nor for some time afterwards. In Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians, e.g. (chap. xlv.), he speaks of bishops as of "those who have offered the gifts of the bishop's office unblamably and holily" (προσ-ενεγκόντας τὰ δῶρα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς), which Bishop Lightfoot² explains as "the prayers and thanksgivings, the alms, the Eucharistic elements, the contributions to the Agapé, and so forth." In Ignatius' Epistle to the Smyrnæans (chap. viii.) we read: "Let that be held a valid Eucharist which is under the bishop or one to whom he shall have committed it. . . . It is not lawful apart from the bishop either to baptize or hold a love-feast" (οὔτε βαπτίζειν οὔτε ἀγάπην ποιεῖν¹), where, as Bishop Lightfoot says, "the two most important functions in which a bishop could have part seem to be described,"² so that the Eucharist seems to be still included in the Agapé. In The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (chap. x.) the thanksgiving is directed to be offered "after being filled"³ (μετὰ τὸ ἐμπλησθῆναι),⁴ i.e., apparently, after the Agapé; and the three-fold thanksgiving

² Cf. Ignat., Ep. Ephes. i. 20, ἓνα ἄρτον κλῶντες ὃ ἐστὶν φάρμακον ἀθανασίας, with Smyrn. i. 7, συνέφερον δὲ αὐτοῖς ἀγαπᾶν ἵνα καὶ ἀναστῶσιν where some take ἀγαπᾶν = ἀγάπην ποιεῖν. See Lightfoot's notes in locis, pp. 307 and 313.

³ N.B. the change of the expression in the corresponding passage in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 26, 1), μετὰ δὲ τὴν μετάληψιν οὕτως εὐχαριστήσατε, showing the influence of later custom.

includes a reference to the gifts of food, and drink, and to God's omnipotence.¹

And later on (chap. xi.) the statement occurs: "He that ordereth a table (ὁρίζων τράπεζαν)² in the Spirit eateth not of it, except he be a false prophet"; which seems to be a reference to the holding of an Agapé, which might in some way be done by the prophet for his own benefit.

We come next to Pliny's famous letter to Trajan (commonly dated 112 A.D.) in which the reference to Christian worship is necessarily obscure because of the writer's evident want of clear information. The passage has naturally been much discussed in recent years, notably by Bishop Lightfoot and Professor W. M. Ramsay; and is so well known that it is needless to quote more of it than is necessary for our immediate purpose.³ The statements which are of most importance in this view are the evidence of two meetings of Christians stato die, one of which was ante lucem,¹ at which they were wont sacramento se obstringere, etc.

³ "Adfirmabant autem hanc fuisse summam vel culpæ suæ vel erroris, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem, seque sacramento non in scelus aliquod obstringere sed ne furta, ne latrocinia, ne adulteria committerent, ne fidem fallerent, ne depositum appellati abnegarent: quibus peractis morem sibi discedendi fuisse rursus coeundi ad capiendum cibum promiscuum tamen et innoxium, quod ipsum facere desisse post edictum meum quo secundum mandata tua hetærias esse vetueram."

The other, the later one,² which is evidently the Agapé, had by this time been separated from that at which a sacramentum was taken.³ What exactly this sacramentum refers to is not likely, with our present knowledge, to be decisively determined. It seems probable enough that Pliny hearing from the Christians of their use of the word sacramentum took it⁴ "sensu Romano," not knowing anything of the early Christian objection to an oath of any kind. And accordingly Tertullian⁵ in his subsequent reproduction of the passage, though he wrongly transcribes "nihil aliud se de sacramentis eorum comperisse," probably gives the general sense rightly when he adds: "quam cœtus antelucanos . . . ad confœderandum disciplinam."⁶

⁴ Cf. Mosheim, de rebus Christianis, p. 150.

⁵ Apologet. chap. ii.

⁶ For later paraphrases of the letter such as, e.g., Eusebius H. E. iii. 32, 33, see Bishop Lightfoot, Ignatius, i. p. 50 ff.

There may be, as Bishop Lightfoot suggests, a confusion of the two sacraments; but, though Pliny did not so understand it, there are grounds for believing the meeting in question to have been that for the Eucharist, as we see, e.g., from Tertullian's parallel statement (de Corona, iii.), when describing the usage of his own time, "Eucharistiæ . . . sacramentum . . . antelucanis cætibus . . . sumimus."¹ At any rate, the Eucharist could not—after this time at least—have been held at the later meeting, which was suppressed by Pliny's direction,² and it is inconceivable that the Christians in Bithynia could have abandoned the Eucharist in consequence of the action of the Roman authorities.³

We have no contemporary evidence as to whether or not the new departure here indicated from the Jewish custom of holding sacrificial and other feasts in the evening was partly due to an instinct of reverence ; but several passages point to its being—primarily at least—due to the fear of persecution,¹ e.g. Origen (c. Celsum, I. i. ad init.) says, in answer to Celsus' impeachment of the "Agapé" as being a secret association in violation of the laws, that "if a man were placed among Scythians . . . and having no opportunity of escape were compelled to live among them, such an one would with good reason (ἐν λόγῳ) enter into associations contrary to their laws." Similarly Tertullian (de Fuga in Persec. ch. xiv.), "Postremo si interdum colligere clear that (1) the law against clubs was strictly enforced by Trajan, and therefore the Agapé presumably abandoned ; (2) there is no mention of the earlier meeting being given up. See Appendix ii. It seems to me that the words "essent soliti" and "morem sibi fuisse" refer to the practice of all Christians at the time ; and also that the mention of the abandonment of the second meeting, whether by the renegades or all Christians in the district, makes it plain that the earlier meetings did not come under the law against hetæriæ. Bp. Lightfoot says, "all alike had abandoned their Agapé" (p. 55).

¹ Cf. Acts xii. 12 ff., "the house . . . where many were gathered together and were praying," with ver. 6, "the same night Peter, etc."

*non potes, habes noctem luce Christi luminosa*¹
adversus eam. Non potes discurrere per singulos; sit tibi et in tribus ecclesia," and Cæcilius Natalis quoted by Minucius Felix (Octavius, chap. viii.), "Christiani latebrosa ac lucifuga natio
in publicum muta, in angulis garrula."

The second statement of Pliny, "Quibus peractis
morem sibi discedendi fuisse rursusque coeundi ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium," evidently refers to the Agapé;
 "ordinary and harmless food" showing the absence of luxury and display afterwards emphasized by Minucius Felix's saying, "we² celebrate our entertainments not only in a reverent, but also in an abstemious manner"; and the groundlessness of the well-known heathen slanders of Θυέστεια δείπνα, Οἰδιποδείους μίξεις,³ etc.

Perhaps the main difficulty of Pliny's description in this connection is that of determining the exact light it throws on the question of the separation of the Agapé and the Eucharist.⁴

¹ "Luminosa" has most authority, "luminosam" gives a clearer sense. Cf. Oehler in loc.

² Min. Felix, Octav. chap. xxxi., "Convivia non tantum pudica colimus sed et sobria."

³ See Bp. Lightfoot, Ignat. vol. ii. p. 53.

⁴ For a discussion of it from another point of view, see Ramsay, u.s., p. 206 ff.

On this question, as Bishop Lightfoot says, one of two alternatives is possible, either the separation had, as I have above suggested, already taken place—as to when there is no evidence—and the Eucharist had been transferred to ante lucem, or the two had hitherto been combined, and were now separated in consequence of the direction mentioned by Pliny. As we have seen above,¹ there is evidence that the two were united up to the time of Ignatius, unless we suppose that the term Agapé had been transferred to the Eucharist alone, which, in view of the subsequent usage of the term, seems highly improbable.²

We pass now to the account of the early Christian congregational worship in Justin Martyr.

In this there is no direct reference to the Agapé, which had apparently been given up in consequence of Trajan's strict enforcement of the law against Sodalicia;³ but the mention of special thanksgiving over ordinary food suggests the common meals. Describing the common life of Christians, Justin says (Apol. i. 67): "Those of us who are wealthy help all that are in want¹ (τοῖς λειπομένοις), and we always remain together (σύνεσμεν²). And for all things that we eat (προσφερόμεθα)³ we bless the Maker of all things through His Son Jesus Christ, and through the Holy Ghost." This passage naturally suggests comparison with the thanksgiving in the Didaché (chap. x. 3): "Thou, O Almighty Ruler, madest all things for Thy name's sake. Thou gavest men food and drink for enjoyment that they might give thanks to Thee."⁴

² It is, of course, possible that they were united even later; and it is also quite possible that the time of separation differed in different local churches; cf., e.g., the peculiar usages in the Thebaid, infra p. 91; and The Canons of Hippolytus (? 3rd cent.) u.s. ἀγάπαις κυριακαῖς.

³ See Appendix ii. There is no certain evidence, however, of the universality of this prohibition, or of its equal enforcement throughout the Empire. Professor Ramsay, however, thinks that the discontinuance of the Agapé in Bithynia may be taken as a type of the action of Christians in this respect. (Church in R.E., p. 358.)

In Justin's account the meeting for instruction mentioned above as possibly derived⁵ from the

² συνουσία is used in Classical Greek much as συμπόσιον, e.g. Plato, Legg. 652 A.

⁴ Cf. the Eucharistic Thanksgiving in the Dialogue with Trypho, chaps. xli. and cxvii., where thanks are offered for the Passion as well as for Creation.

⁵ Bishop Lightfoot in his Cambridge Lectures on Acts xiii. held that it was so derived.

Synagogue appears now to be joined with the Eucharist, conceivably in consequence of the enforced discontinuance of the Agapé.

The common life of the Christians is also dwelt on elsewhere (Apol. i. 13), “ὁμοδίαιτοι γινόμενοι,” a passage which again suggests the Agapé.¹

In the Epistle to Diognetus, which Bishop Lightfoot assigns to the middle of the second century as its probable date, in the beautiful description of the life of the early Christians, it is said (chap. v.), “They have their meals in common” (τράπεξαν κοινὴν παρατίθενται).

I cannot find any reference² or even allusion to the Agapé in Irenæus. The chief passages in which he refers to the Eucharist³ (adv. Hæreses lib. iv. chaps. xxix. and xxxi.) are, for obvious reasons, doctrinal and not descriptive; but, had the connection between the Agapé and the Eucharist still survived, it is unlikely that no allusion to it would have been traceable.

² See below Appendix ii. for the state of legislation at the time of Marcus Aurelius (161-180). It throws no light on Irenæus' silence. I do not agree with those who infer from Irenæus' silence the non-existence of the Agapé in Gaul. Why should the usage of Gaul be exceptional in this respect?

³ See Harvey's Irenæus, ii. pp. 205-210, and notes.

But when we come to Tertullian (whose orthodox writings¹ are usually dated at from 197 to 203 A.D.), we find the Agapé again emerging into prominence² in the recorded life of the early Church. Portions of the detailed description in the Apologeticum have already been quoted. The remainder of the passage is now given.

"I shall now proceed to give my own account of the practices of the Christian community (factionis), that as I have disproved that they are evil, I may demonstrate that they are good. We (Christians) are a body³ (corpus sumus) owing to our association⁴ in religion (conscientia religionis), our unity in discipline, and our common bond of hope (sper foedere). We come together as an assembly and congregation in order that, approaching God as in a compact body (manu facta), we may beset Him (ambiamus) with prayers and supplications.⁵ This violence is well-pleasing to God. We pray also for the Emperors, for their ministers, and the powers that be (potestatibus), for the condition of the age, for peace in the world (rerum), for the delay of the Last Day (finis). We meet together for the recitation¹ of our Divine Scriptures, in case anything in the condition of the times calls either for forewarning or reminder. At any rate we feed our faith and animate our hope by the sacred utterances; we stablish our confidence; and no less by the inculcation of their precepts do we strengthen good order (disciplinam). There are exhortations, too, reproofs, and holy discipline (censura divina). For judgment takes place with great solemnity as among those who are convinced of the presence of God (with them), and the gravest anticipation (præjudicium) of judgment to come takes place, when anyone has sinned to such a degree as to be banished from fellowship with us in prayer, and worship (conventus), and all sacred intercourse. . . .²

one another'—for in truth they themselves hate one another; and 'see how they are ready to die for each other'—for they themselves are more ready to slay one another. And they are mad with us for calling each other brethren, for no other reason, I imagine, than that among themselves every name of kinship (sanguinis) has been assumed in mere pretence."¹

"But we are your brethren as well by the right of our common mother nature, although you are hardly² men at all because you are such bad brothers. But with how much more reason are they both called and accounted brothers who have acknowledged one God as their Father, who have drunk of one spirit of holiness, who from the same womb of a common ignorance have won³ their way out into the light of truth that is one."

"But it may be that we are the less accounted as true (legitimi) brothers because no tragedy cries aloud about our brotherhood, or because the very thing which commonly puts an end to brotherhood among you, viz., family property, is just that (the community of) which our brotherhood depends on (ex substantia familiari fratres sumus, quæ penes vos fere dirimit fraternitatem). And so we, who are one in mind and soul, have no hesitation about sharing our possessions with each other.¹

“Let this meeting of Christians be judged on its merits. Let it be held unlawful indeed, if it is on a level with meetings that are unlawful; let it be condemned, if anyone has the same ground for complaint against it that there is against (other) factions. Did we ever come together to the ruin of any person? We are the same in our assemblies as we are when separate units, the same collectively as individually; we injure nobody, we bring sorrow on nobody. When, therefore, men who are upright and good meet together, when those who are devout and moral hold an assembly, it ought not to be called a faction, but a curia—a solemn conclave.”

A comparison of this description with that of the Eucharist in Justin Martyr² makes it abundantly

² How far Justin refers to Eastern practice in his Apology, written at Rome to the Roman Emperor, has long been disputed; but it seems improbable that he, as an Eastern, should have passed any great divergence of usage between East and West over without notice, had there been such.

clear that the Agapé and the Eucharist are now quite distinct, at least in North Africa, and probably, therefore, throughout the Western Church, and that it is the Agapé alone which is spoken of here in the words referring to food.

The following table exhibits the differences¹:—

Eucharist (Justin).	Agapé (Tertullian).
Lections. ²	Preliminary Prayer.
Sermon.	Conversation quasi coram Domino . The Meal.
Intercession (said by all).	Ablutions.
Kiss of Peace.	Lights brought in.

Consecration with words of Institution.	Final Prayer.
Intercession by President with Amen.	Distribution to the poor.

The term curia—a solemn meeting—which Tertullian applies to the feast seems to indicate sufficiently its sacred character. It appears to have given good ground for his previous description of the Christian community, "Corpus sumus de conscientia religionis et disciplinæ unitate et spei fœdere."

Bishop Kaye¹ remarks on this description that, though Tertullian does not expressly say it, "it may fairly be inferred that the materials of the feast were furnished out of the oblations made at the Eucharist, a portion of which appears also to have been allotted to the martyrs in prison." And similarly Dr Hey² says that "the Priests had a portion of them (the oblations), and the rest furnished the repast called the Agapé."

Tertullian both in the Apologeticum (chap. vii.)³ and elsewhere speaks of the heathen misrepresentations of what took place at the Agapé. "It is the common talk that we are the wickedest of men, for that we have a mystery which involves the killing and eating of a child, with incest after our banquet; that we have dogs to upset the lights, etc." (Dici-

Speaking of the same thing, Minucius says, “illic¹ post multas epulas ubi convivium caluit et incestæ,” etc., which could hardly be an allusion to the Eucharist.

In the treatise ad Nationes (i. chap. vii.) Tertullian says: “First of all a business of deceit is practised (fallaciæ negotium perpetratur); stories of feasts and marriages² are pawned off on those who are ignorant (ignaris . . . subjiciuntur), for they had heard nothing previously (retro) about the Christian mysteries.”

But in the Montanist treatise de Jejuniis (chap. xvii.) he himself attacks the licentiousness of the Agapé: “At your house love (agapé) is warmed up with saucepans (caccabis fervet); faith is fomented in kitchens, hope rests on dishes. But an Agapé is all the more important, because by means of this young men cum sororibus dormiunt," a passage which seems to show that the constantly recurring danger of abuse had manifested itself afresh.

Tertullian's words here are in somewhat sad contrast to those of his treatise ad Martyras (chap. ii.): "Meanwhile let us compare the life of the world and of the prison, to see if the spirit does not gain more in prison than the flesh loses. Nay even the flesh does not lose what is due to it, owing to the care of the Church and the love of the brethren (agapen fratrum);¹ and, in addition, the spirit gains things that are lasting aids to faith."

As to the time at which the Agapé was held there is a somewhat obscure hint in the words (Apol. chap. xxxix.) already quoted: "They satisfy their hunger, but so that they may bear in mind that even through the night they have to worship God."² But the subsequent words "after the bringing of water for the hands and lights (lumina)" seem to indicate that the "cæna" (chap. xxxix.) began somewhat early in the evening, though, because, for instance, of the services of praise referred to, it might be prolonged "per noctem."

² "It would seem probable that the . . . Agapé would follow closely on the conclusion of the business of the Church. It seems to have been held in daylight, and therefore not later than four or five o'clock in the afternoon." Dr J. Wordsworth, The Holy Communion (p. 45).

Tertullian's references or allusions to the Eucharist seem to show that in his day it was celebrated before dawn and received fasting.¹ "Will not your husband know," he says (ad Uxorem, book ii. 5), "what it is you secretly take before other food (*quid secreto ante omnem cibum*² gustes)." And, again, "who will without anxiety endure her absence all night long at the Paschal solemnities (sollemnibus Paschae abnoctantem)? Who will without some suspicion of his own let her go to attend that Lord's Banquet which they defame" (convivium dominicum illud quod defamant)?

The reference in the de Corona (chap. iii.) has been so much disputed that it will need special consideration.

Tertullian is dwelling on customs which are due to tradition "sine ullius Scripturæ instrumento," and, after speaking of Baptismal customs, he adds: "Eucharistiæ sacramentum et in tempore victus et omnibus mandatum a Domino, etiam antelucanis cœtibus, nec de aliorum manu quam præsidentium sumimus."¹

¹ And so apart from the Agapé. There is nothing, of course, to indicate a rigid law of fasting.

² Where some think reservation for private reception is alluded to. Cf. De Orat. chap. xiv. and Oehler's note. Bishop Kingdon, Fasting Communion, p. 200 ff., translates "ante omnem cibum," "before every meal," but this does not commend itself.

The exact force of "etiam" here seems most likely to be determined by comparison with its other uses in the same chapter, viz., above: "Etiam in traditionis obtentu exigenda est, inquis, auctoritas scripta," where it obviously qualifies what follows, and means "even"—"even where tradition is pleaded written authority is to be required."

And further on "Calicis aut panis etiam nostri aliquid decuti in terram anxie patimur"—"we are distressed, i.e. that any of the cup or bread, even though our ²own (i.e. not consecrated), should be cast to the ground." And so here the "etiam" serves to emphasize "antelucanis." "The sacrament of the Eucharist, which was enjoined by the Lord both during the time of eating, and upon all, we receive ³ even at gatherings before dawn, and not at the hands of others than the presidents."

The last expression "the presidents" is important as suggesting a connection with two other passages. One of them is in the earlier part of the chapter (Apologet. chap. xxxix.) in which the Agapé is described, and some of which I may, perhaps, quote again for clearness' sake. "We meet together as an assembly and congregation in order that approaching God in a compact body (manu facto) we may beset Him with prayers and supplications. This violence is well pleasing to God. We pray also for the Emperors, for their ministers and the powers that be; for the condition of the age, for peace in the world, for the delay of the Last Day. We meet together for the recitation of our Divine Scriptures. . . . In the same place also exhortations are made. . . . Our presidents are men of age and standing (character). . . . We have a kind of treasure-chest. . . . Everyone places there a small contribution on one day in the month. . . . These . . . are for feeding and burying the poor," etc.

The similarity of this description to the second passage I have spoken of, viz. Justin Martyr's¹ well-known account of the Eucharist, will at once be apparent. Justin says they are assembled together "to offer up prayers in common both for ourselves . . . and all others everywhere. . . . Then is brought to the President (τῷ προεστῶτι) bread and a cup." . . . And again (chap. lxvii.) "On the day called Sunday there is an assembly in the same place . . . and the records of the Apostles or the writings of the prophets are read. . . . And the President verbally instructs and exhorts. . . . And there is a distribution and a partaking by everyone of the Eucharistic elements (ἀπὸ τῶν εὐχαριστηθέντων). . . . And such as are in prosperous circumstances give what they will; and what is collected is placed in the hands of the President, who assists the orphans and widows and such as are in want."

It is hard to believe that Tertullian's reference is not to the same service as Justin's, though he makes no mention of the consecration of the elements. Afterwards Tertullian adds, "You abuse also our humble feasts," and then goes on to describe the Agapé, thus following, whether intentionally or not, the order of the two meetings given by Pliny in his letter to Trajan.

There are numerous¹ other references or allusions to the Eucharist in Tertullian, which it would not be very much to the purpose to quote ; but they have a certain bearing on this investigation in so far as they tend to confirm what has been already shown to be practically certain, viz., that in Tertullian's time, i.e. at the end of the second century, the Eucharist and the Agapé were separate, at least in parts of the Western Church.

It remains to collect a few scattered references or allusions in less known or somewhat doubtful writings of the second century.

In the Apology of Aristides, which appears² to belong to about the middle of that period, I cannot find any reference either to the Eucharist or the Agapé ; but there are words which are to the same effect as those of Justin Martyr quoted above. "And he who has gives to him who has not without grudging. . . ." (chap. xv. Syriac Version.) . . . "Every morning, and at all hours, on account of the goodness of God towards them they praise and laud Him. And over their food and their drink they render Him thanks" (ἐὐχαριστοῦντες, Greek Version).

In the Apocryphal Vision of Paul (chap. xl.) occurs this (obviously corrupt) sentence, in an account of the lapsed: "¹ But the entanglements of the world made them unhappy. They did not hold feasts of love, they did not show pity to widows and orphans, they did not entertain the stranger and alien, nor offer the oblation, nor show mercy to their neighbour."

In the *Acts*² of Paul and Thekla, part of which appears to be a second century document, Paul is described (chap. xxiii.) as fasting "in a sepulchre"³ (Greek MS.) or "house" (Armenian MS.), and (chap. xxv.) "there was within the tomb"⁴ ἀγάπη πολλή, (Lat. gaudium magnum, Armenian, "and Paul rejoiced exceedingly along with those who were with him"). "And the lad brought five

In the Passion of St. Perpetua (chap. xvii.), which is variously dated at from 198 to 203 A.D., there is an account of how the martyrs³ were publicly entertained the day before their passion at the supper prepared for those condemned to the beasts, which they turned into an Agapé.

I have left to the last the well-known statement of Lucian (De Morte Peregrini, chap. xii.), made a little after the middle of the second century, which is not definite enough to be of much value, but the combined mention of δειπνα and λόγοι in which seems⁴ to point to the Christian Agapé. He is

CHAPTER III

THE AGAPÉ IN THE THIRD CENTURY

IN entering on the next stage of our inquiry we pass from West to East, from the usages connected with the Agapé as known to Tertullian in Africa, and, presumably, in the Western Church generally, to those of the Churches of Alexandria as known to Clement.

This part of the investigation is even more abstruse and difficult than the rest, partly because of the frequent obscurity of Clement's language, and the mystical character of many of his allusions to the Eucharist and the Agapé, partly because there is some evidence that in this, as in some other respects, the usages of the early churches of Alexandria and the neighbourhood may have been exceptional.

Two of the most recent writers on the subject in English, Dr Bigg and Professor Allen,¹ agree in thinking that at this time "the Eucharist¹ was not distinguished in time, ritual, or motive from the primitive Supper of the Lord."

It may be well, therefore, to examine the statements of Clement in the light of these deservedly weighty opinions. Dr Bigg holds, but "with some hesitation," that at Alexandria the Eucharist and the Agapé were still both celebrated together in the evening; and in proof of his view he urges, inter alia, that (i) "the Agapé in both its forms (i.e. the public and private) is distinctly mentioned, the Eucharist as a separate office is not"; and (ii) that "the word Eucharist is employed of the Agapé."

As to the first statement, viz. that the Eucharist as a separate office is not mentioned, it seems to be true that the Eucharist as a liturgical office is not described or expressly spoken of; but on the other hand, most, if not all, of the doctrinal statements in Clement about the Eucharist seem to be carefully kept apart from references to the Agapé; and there are in addition several references to the Eucharist which do not seem to suggest its connection with the Agapé.

At the beginning of the Miscellanies, for instance,

(Bk. I. i. 5), where Clement is speaking of the respective duties of ministers and those ministered to, he says "both must therefore test themselves: the one if he is qualified to speak, and leave behind him written records; the other if he is in a right state to hear and read; as also some, in the dispensation of the Eucharist, according to custom, enjoin that each one of the people individually should take his part" (τὴν εὐχαριστίαν διανείμαντες, ὡς ἔθος, αὐτὸν δὴ ἕκαστον τοῦ λαοῦ λαβεῖν τὴν μοῖραν ἐπιτρέπουσιν). And he goes on to speak of the danger of eating the bread and drinking the cup of the Lord unworthily, and being "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," without any reference to the Agapé. Then he proceeds to say: "Blessed are the peace-makers, those who lead such as are at war in their life and errors here back to the peace which is in the Word, and they who nourish for the life which is according to God, by the distribution of the bread, those that hunger after righteousness."

And again (Pædag. ii. 2, 19) we find him saying: "And the mixture of the cup¹ and the Word is called Eucharist, renowned and glorious grace (ἀμφοῖν αὐθις κρᾶσις ποτοῦ τε καὶ Λόγου εὐχαριστία κέκληται, χάρις ἐπαινουμένη καὶ καλή), and they who by faith partake of it are sanctified both in body and soul."

In the Miscellanies (i. 19, 96), he speaks of those heresies "which employ bread and water in the oblation (κατὰ τὴν προσφορὰν), not according to the rule of the Church. For there are those who celebrate the Eucharist with mere water" (εἰσὶν γὰρ οἱ καὶ ὕδωρ ψιλὸν εὐχαριστοῦσιν).

And, again (Strom. vi. 14, 113), "And giving thanks always for all things to God by righteous hearing and divine reading, by true investigation, by holy oblation, by blessed prayer (διὰ προσφορᾶς ἁγίας, δι' εὐχῆς μακαρίας), lauding, hymning, blessing, praising, such a soul is never at any time separated from God."

The expression "offering" (προσφορὰ) here applied in the two last passages to the Eucharist, and the context in which it occurs, certainly do not suggest any connection with the Agapé as spoken of elsewhere.¹

And further we find that Clement speaks quite separately of irregularities and abuses with regard to the Eucharist and the Agapé. One set of heretics, for instance, the Carpocratians, are condemned for their immoralities in connection with the Agapé.

¹“Gathering together for their suppers, for I at least would not call their meeting a love-feast . . . putting out of the way the light, quod eorum fornicatoriam hanc justitiam pudore afficiebat, dicunt coire quomodo velint . . . meditados autem in ejusmodi ‘agape’ communionem interdium jam, etc.” Whereas in another place he speaks of those heresies (of the Encratites) who employ bread and water in the oblation (Strom. i. 19).²

With regard to the application of the word Eucharist to the Agapé as alleged by Dr Bigg, it is important to notice in the first place that there seems no reason to doubt the statement of Bishop Kaye³ that Clement at times uses the word Eucharist and the corresponding verb in their original untechnical sense of “giving thanks.” The two passages on which Dr Bigg

In the passage in question Clement is obviously speaking of behaviour at a social meeting (*συνουσία*¹); and he quotes St Paul's words (Rom. xiv. 3): "Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not"; and, a little further on, he explains the reason of the command, when he says "he that eateth, eateth to the Lord and giveth God thanks," and "he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks" (where there appears to be no reason to depart from the untechnical sense of εὐχαριστεῖ in the passage in St Paul, which has clearly no reference to the Agapé or the Eucharist). And Clement goes on to say as an inference from this: "so that the true meal is a thanksgiving, and he who is indeed always giving thanks does not busy himself about pleasures,"² where the use of the article, and the order of the Greek seem to show the meaning to be not, as

Dr Bigg translates "so that a religious meal is an Eucharist," but "so that the normal or just meal, i.e. the meal which is taken δικαίως (in a true or moral spirit) is a (i.e. one long) thanksgiving, or involves thanksgiving."

And later on he proceeds: "The Apostle then, checking (ἀνακρούων) those that habitually transgress in their conduct at an entertainment says, etc. . . . [τοὺς ἐπὶ ἐστιάσεως οὖν μελετῶντας ἀδικεῖν (cf. τὴν δικαίαν τροφήν)]." This passage when compared with that quoted above about Carpocratian¹ immorality at the Agapé, shows that δικαίαν here refers not to the "religious" or non-religious character of the meal, but to the conduct and tone of the partakers.

In the second passage (Pædagog. chap. ii. 10, 96) Clement is admonishing those who need an Instructor against gross immorality or shameless² behaviour in the day-time, or in the morning, on coming from church or market: and then he adds that—in contrast, i.e. to the day-time, or morning, which is "the fitting time for prayer and reading and good works"—the evening is the time for recreation—"but in the evening it is fitting to take one's ease after the repast, and after the thanksgiving for one's enjoyments (ἐσπέρας δε ἀναπαύσασθαι καθήκει μετὰ τὴν ἐστίασιν καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἐπὶ ταῖς ἀπολαύσεσιν εὐχαριστίαν)." In this sentence ἐστίασις may refer either to the ordinary supper or, possibly, to the Agapé, and εὐχαριστία to the ordinary thanksgiving after the enjoyments of the table which would be common to both; but the genius of the whole passage seems against restricting the sense either of ἐστίασις or of εὐχαριστία to the Agapé, or to the Eucharist.

Dr Bigg says that "ἐστίασις in Clement means the Agapé," but clearly it is not in any sense a technical word either in Clement or elsewhere, and cannot be so restricted. Elsewhere in the Pædagogus, for instance, the word is not so restricted (Bk. II. i. 8), "those that are absorbed in pots . . . the Holy Spirit by Isaiah denounces as wretched, depriving them tacitly of the name of love, since their feasting was not in accordance with the word" (τῆς ἀγάπης τὸ ὄνομα ὑπεξελόμενον, ἐπεὶ μὴ κατὰ λόγον ἡ ἐστίασις ἦν), and (Bk. ii., i., 4.): "gatherings for the sake of mirth we, too, in our enumeration would naturally call suppers, dinners, receptions, in this coming together following the Word ; but such feastings the Lord has not called Agapæ" (τὰς μὲν γὰρ ἐπὶ τῆς εὐφροσύνης συναγωγὰς . . . τὰς τοιαύτας δὲ ἐστιάσεις ὁ κύριος ἀγάπας οὐ κέκληκεν).

So far for these arguments of Dr Bigg's with regard to the union of the Agapé and the Eucharist in Clement's time.

Before leaving this part of the subject it may be well to quote a few of Clement's statements as to the Agapé itself, which seem to reinforce the previous considerations.

The Agapé as described or referred to by Clement, seems to be of two kinds, public and private.¹ The chief evidence is to be found at the beginning of the second book of the Instructor "on eating," i.e. in general, as well as at the Agapé. "It is a mark," he says, "of a silly mind to be amazed and stupefied at what is presented at public banquets after the rich fare which is the Word"² (τεθηπέναι τὰ παρατιθέμενα ταῖς δημόδεσιν ἐστιάσεσι μετὰ τὴν ἐν Λόγῳ τρυφήν). Just before he had spoken of what was apparently a private Agapé, where "we are to partake of what is set before us as becomes a Christian, out of respect to him who has invited¹ us (τὸν κεκληκότα), by a harmless and moderate participation in the social meeting" (κατὰ τὴν ἀβλαβῇ καὶ ἀπροσκορῇ τῆς συνουσίας κοινωνίαν).

And the true character of an Agapé is described at length in the same chapter (§ 4). "We who seek the heavenly bread must rule the belly. . . . Some speaking with unbridled tongue dare to apply the name Agapé to pitiful suppers redolent of savour and sauces. Dishonouring the good and saving work of the Word, the consecrated (τὴν ἡγιασμένην) Agapé, with pots and pouring of sauce, . . . having expected that the promise of God might be bought with suppers. . . . But 'when thou makest an entertainment call the poor,' for whose sake chiefly a supper ought to be made. . . . But ἀγάπη is in truth celestial food, a feast of reason (ἐπουράνιός ἐστι τροφή, ἐστίασις λογική). 'It beareth all things.' 'Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the kingdom of God.' But the hardest of all cases is for ἀγάπη, which fadeth not, to be cast from heaven above to the ground, into the midst of sauces. . . . If thou shalt love the Lord thy God and thy neighbour, this is the celestial festival in the heavens. But the earthly is called a supper; as has been shown from Scripture, the supper is made for ἀγάπη, but the supper is not ἀγάπη; only a proof of mutual and reciprocal¹ kindly feeling. Let not then your good be evil spoken of, 'for the kingdom of God is not meat and drink,' says the Apostle, in order that it may not be the mere ephemeral meal that is to be thought of, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." He who eats of this meal,² the best of all things, shall acquire the kingdom of God, fixing his regards even while here³ on the holy assembly of love, the heavenly ἐκκλησία. 'Αγάπη, then, is something pure and worthy of God, and its work is distribution (ἡ μετὰδοσις). . . . "And these joys have an inspiration of love, from the feeding⁴ of the people at large, which habituates⁵ to everlasting dainties. 'Αγάπη, then, is not a supper. But let the entertainment depend on love" (αἱ δὲ εὐφροσύναι αὐταὶ ἑναυσμά τι ἀγάπης ἔχουσιν ἐκ τῆς πανδήμου τροφῆς συνεθιζόμενον εἰς αἰδίου τρυφῆν· ἀγάπη μὲν οὖν δεῖπνον οὐκ ἔστιν, ἡ δὲ ἐστίασις ἀγάπης ἡρτήσθω). . . . "Take no pleasure in abominable delicacies," says Wisdom. . . . We are enjoined to abstain (from things sacrificed to idols). . . . "For I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons," says the Apostle. . . . It is inconsistent with reason for those who have been made worthy to share divine and spiritual food to partake of "a table of demons" "οὐκ εὐλόγου τραπέξης δαιμόνων μεταλαμβάνειν τοὺς θείας μετέχειν καὶ πνευματικῆς κατηξίωμένους τροφῆς). . . . It is an admirable thing, therefore, to raise our eyes aloft to that which is true . . . to depend on that divine food above . . . for such is the Agapé, which the food that comes from Christ (ἡ βρῶσις ἡ τοῦ χριστοῦ) shows that we ought to look forward to" (ἐκδέχεται).¹

This passage is highly mystical, and consequently ambiguous in parts; but, with perhaps one or two exceptions,² the language is different from that in which Clement speaks of the Eucharist. One or two expressions seem to imply a previous reception of "divine food"—an epithet

¹ Or "to understand." The translation in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library has "partake of," wrongly, as it seems.

² Such as τὴν ἡγιασμένην ἀγάπην.

elsewhere¹ in the fathers applied to the Eucharist. And the general impression left on the mind is not, I think, that the Eucharist and the Agapé were still united in Clement's time.²

And this impression is further strengthened by the considerations which are tersely summarised by Dr Bigg himself as standing against his inference. I give them in his own words.

(1) "That the separation was already made in the West, as we see from Justin and Tertullian, and is found immediately after Clement's time in Palestine teste Origen. (2) That the word Eucharist is employed by Clement for the elements (Strom. chap. i. 1, 5) and for the rite (Pæd. chap. ii. 2, 20; Strom. chap. iv. 25, 161). (3) That there was a morning³ service in Alexandria, though we are not told that it included the Eucharist (Pæd. chap. ii. 10, 96)."

² For evidence of their separation in church ordinances see below, chap. iv.

³ This is probably the daily office of the Can. Hippol. 217. Congregentur . . . quotidie in ecclesia . . . populus tempore gallicinii vacentque orationi, cf. id. 245, and Egypt. Can. Reliqq. lxxvii (Hauler, p. 117).

The strongest consideration which Dr Bigg urges in favour of the non-separation I have left to the last, viz., that he does "not know of any passage in an Oriental writer before Clement's time in which the Eucharist appears as a distinct and substantive office."

This statement seems a little strong in face of the fact that Justin Martyr, a native of Syrian Palestine,¹ and therefore an Oriental writer, though one writing at Rome to the Emperor, gives no hint of a divergent usage between East and West, and that Pliny's account of Oriental usage in Bithynia, though admittedly obscure, is so closely parallel in some points with Tertullian,² whose account resembles Justin Martyr's. But in the face of these facts, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, we should be disposed to expect similarity of use in Alexandria with the rest of the Churches, but for Socrates'³ statement, which is as follows: "The Egyptians in the neighbourhood of Alexandria and the inhabitants of Thebais hold their religious assemblies on the Sabbath (i.e. Saturday), but do not participate in the mysteries in the manner usual among Christians in general"⁴; for after having eaten and satisfied themselves with food of all kinds, in the evening they make their offerings, and they partake of the mysteries."

This statement is certainly remarkable, and though made as late as 439 A.D., i.e. two centuries later than the time of Clement, evidently refers to an ancient practice in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, though not, be it noticed, in Alexandria itself.¹ Undoubtedly there seem to have been divergent practices in the Egyptian churches as, e.g., in the famous case of the appointment, though not necessarily the consecration,² of presbyters. And this passage itself indicates what may well have been one of the sources of these divergencies, viz. the survival of Jewish-Christian customs, such as observing the Sabbath, which might have been due to the very strong influence of Judaism in Alexandria and its neighbourhood. Professor Mommsen³ mentions that in the second century two out of five of the quarters of that city were inhabited by Jews, and M. Ampère, an Egyptologist of note, describes Alexandria in the second century as¹ "very Greek, considerably Jewish, and hardly Egyptian at all." A somewhat lurid light is thrown on the condition of the Alexandrian Church by an unknown second-century writer,² who says that "he who in Egypt worships Sarapis is also a Christian, and those who call themselves Christian Bishops likewise adore Sarapis. Every grand Rabbi of the Jews, every Samaritan, every Christian clergyman is there at the same time a sorcerer, a prophet, a quack (aliptes.) Even when the patriarch comes to Egypt some demand that he pray to Sarapis, others that he pray to Christ."

When we pass from Clement of Alexandria to Origen the contrast is striking. Origen scarcely dwells at all on the subject of the Agapé, whereas he refers perhaps more frequently to the Eucharist, in proportion to the length of his writings, than Clement. The difference no doubt is largely due to the different character and scope of their works. It may, however, possibly indicate that the Agapé was already beginning to decline in prominence. But the chief reference to the Agapé in Origen is so important in its bearing on the whole history of the subject that it may be well to give it at length.

² Mommsen (u.s. vol. ii. p. 226) from the Vita Saturnini (of Vopiscus), chap. i. 8. It is clear that an enemy hath written this; but it points to the disintegrating forces which were at work upon early Christianity in Alexandria. See Mommsen's note further. Bishop Lightfoot, Phil. p. 225 n., attributes the letter to Hadrian—wrongly according to Mommsen. It is in the Augustan History, xxix. 8, Vopiscus expressly attributes it to Hadrian, but there are difficulties. See Gregorovius, The Emperor Hadrian, Eng. Tran., p. 124.

At the beginning of the treatise against Celsus (bk. i. chap. i.) Origen speaks of Celsus' first point of attack against the Christians as being that "they enter into secret associations with each other contrary to law (συνθήκας κρύβδην πρὸς ἀλλήλους ποιουμένων παρὰ τὰ νενομισμένα), saying that of associations some are open, and such as are formed in accordance with laws; others, again, secret, and such as are formed contrary to legal enactments. And his wish is to calumniate what is called the Agapé of the Christians, (as)¹ taking its rise from the common danger, and having a power that transcends oaths (ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινού κινδύνου ὑφισταμένην, καὶ δυναμένην ὑπερ-όρκια). Since then he babbles about the common law, alleging that the associations of Christians are in violation of it, we have to reply that, if a man came to be among Scythians, whose laws were unholy (ἀθέσμους), and, if, having no opportunity of escape, he were compelled to live among them, such an one would with good reason, for the sake of the law of truth, which the Scythians would regard as transgression of law (παρανομίαν), enter into associations, contrary to their laws, with those like minded with himself. . . . It is not unreasonable then to form associations in opposition to existing laws, if it be done for the sake of what is truth."

We have here a clue to the whole early history of the Agapé, but one which unfortunately it is almost impossible to follow owing to the lack of contemporary evidence. It is possible that the discovery of fresh inscriptions may in time throw further light on the subject. But at present it is not possible to determine with certainty exactly how far, throughout its history, the Agapé was affected by the legal¹ enactments of the emperors. From the very earliest times associations¹ or guilds of a more or less religious character had, as we have seen, been common at Rome, part of their raison d'être having been a common table; and had been treated under the Republic with comparative leniency, provided that their meetings were not nocturnal or clandestine, or likely to prove prejudicial to the public safety. But under the Empire much stricter watch began to be kept over them. Julius, and later Augustus, suppressed all "collegia" which seemed likely to prove dangerous. Only those that were venerable from their antiquity, or obviously harmless, were allowed to survive; and new foundations were prohibited if they were without special permission,² which was but sparingly given. This supervision was most strictly exercised by the wisest and best of the Emperors; and, as Pliny (Epist. x. 43) tells us, their carefulness was not without warrant; for he represents Trajan as replying to his enquiry as to whether a "collegium fabrorum" might be instituted in Nicomedia, that the province was disturbed "ejusmodi factionibus," and that such associations, under whatever name or for whatever reason they might be founded, tended to become "hetæriæ." This supervision was rigorously directed to be exercised by the governors in the provinces. There was, however, a constant tendency to relax the formal discipline of the law;¹ and, probably in consequence of this, the Agapæ were able to subsist for a considerable time. But under Trajan, as we have seen,² strictness was reinforced; and under this régime the Agapæ were—at least partially—suppressed. Still, however, owing, no doubt, to the great tendency to form collegia, and to their corresponding to a felt want among the people, it was difficult to keep up a very strict censorship; and so,³ as we have seen, in the latter part of the second and earlier part of the third centuries the Agapæ were regularly celebrated among the Christian communities in East and West alike. Gradually, as time went on, it became impossible to restrain the growth of these associations; and it became part of the Imperial policy to give legal recognition to what could not adequately be repressed, and even to impress it into the state service.

² Cf. de instituendo collegio fabrorum consulebamur. Pliny, Panegy. chap. 54. See Boissier, La Religion Romaine, ii. p. 249, etc., and infra, Appendix II. But cf. also Ramsay (on I Cor.) xxxv.

Alexander Severus,¹ for instance (A.D. 222-235), made himself specially prominent in this respect, by giving official recognition to the collegia of arts and crafts, and appointing tribunals before which accused members of these fraternities should be tried.²

This was no doubt an instance of the gradually growing spirit of toleration in the Empire, which first took prominent shape in the Edict of Caracalla³ (A.D. 212), and culminated in the Edict of Milan (A.D. 313).

But in the meantime their comparative toleration had contributed towards the corruption of the Agapæ, as noticed by Tertullian and Clement, who wrote, the one during, the other soon after, the reign of Septimius Severus; and accordingly we find Origen, on the one hand, speaking as boldly of the history of the Agapæ as has been mentioned, but, on the other hand, making comparatively little reference to them in his other writings.

In the doubtful Commentary on Job (Lib. iii.

³ Which was tolerant in effect, though not at first in intention.

p. 238, Lommatsch.) we find an apparent reference to a subsequent development of the Agapæ into commemorations¹ of the departed. "We celebrate them indeed, assembling the pious (religiosos) along with the priests, the faithful along with the clergy, inviting thither the poor, feeding (saturantes) wards (pupillos) and widows, so that our solemnity (festivitas) may be a requiem commemoration for the souls, whose memory we celebrate (in memoriam requiei animabus quarum memoriam celebramus"²).

In his Commentary on the Romans (chap. xvi. 16) Origen refers to the holy "kisses which are given in the assemblies." "But in the first place, as we have said, let the believer's kiss be chaste. Then let him have in himself peace and felicity in love—ἀγάπη—unfeigned."

And in the latter part of the treatise against Celsus (Lib. viii. chap. 33), when contrasting the worship of demons by Celsus with Christian worship, he adds: "³but we, giving thanks to the Creator of all, eat the loaves which are brought (to the table) with thanksgiving, and with prayer over what has been given, when they have become, as they do because of the prayer, a certain holy body, which sanctifies those who use it with a holy purpose." These words recall the form of thanksgiving in the Didaché, and Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 65); but, inter alia, the allusion to St. Paul's contrast between the table of demons and the table of the Lord, point to their relating to the Eucharist, and not, as some have thought, to the Agapé.¹

When we turn to the next Western source of information, St. Cyprian, we find the practice of the African Church more decisively defined, and the Agapé and the Eucharist emphatically differentiated.

The chief passage on the subject is in the famous letter (63) on the mixed Chalice, which Archbishop Benson seems to agree with Pearson in dating about 253 A.D.² Cyprian has been condemning the heretical practice of offering water alone in the Eucharist, and dwelling on the importance of the mixed Cup, and he proceeds: "Does anyone perchance flatter himself with this notion that, although in the morning water alone is seen to be offered, yet when we come to supper we offer the mingled cup? But when we sup we cannot call the people together to our banquet so as to celebrate the truth of the sacrament in the presence of all the brotherhood" (ut sacramenti veritatem fraternitate omni præsente celebremus). "But it may be said (At enim) it was not in the morning, but after supper that the Lord offered the mingled cup. Ought we then to celebrate the Lord's (Feast—*Dominicum*¹) after supper, that so by multiplying² the Lord's Feasts (frequentandis Dominicis) we may offer the mingled cup?"

"It behoved Christ to offer about the evening of the day, that the very hour of sacrifice might symbolise the setting, and the evening of the world; as it is written in Exodus, 'and all the people of the synagogue of the children of Israel shall kill it in the evening.' And again in the Psalms, 'let the lifting up of my hands be an evening sacrifice.' But we celebrate the Resurrection of the Lord in the morning."¹

In another passage the character of the Agapé in Cyprian's time is clearly indicated (ad Donatum, chap. xvi.). "Since this is a holiday rest, and time of leisure, whatever remains of the day now that the sun is sloping towards evening, let us spend it in gladness (ducamus hanc diem læti); nor let even the hour of repast be without heavenly grace. Let the temperate festivity resound with psalms² (sonet psalmos convivium sobrium), and, as your memory is tenacious and your voice musical, undertake this office as is your wont. You will provide a better entertainment for your dearest friends, if while we have something spiritual to listen to, the sweetness of religious music charm our ears" (prolectet aures religiosa mulcedo).

Again, in his treatise on the Lapsed (chap. vi.), Cyprian seems to speak as if the Agapæ were held in the Church, when, in denouncing unfaithful bishops, he speaks of those "who hunted the markets for gainful merchandise, and brought no aid¹ to starving brethren in the Church." And in the treatise² on Works and Alms (chap. xv.), he alludes to the primitive custom of contributing materials for the Agapé, and the Eucharist, which had apparently now developed into the offerings³ of bread and wine for the Eucharist only. "You are rich and wealthy, and think you that you celebrate the feast of the Lord,⁴ who are altogether negligent of the offering; who come into the Lord's house without a sacrifice, and take part out of that sacrifice which the poor has offered."⁵

² Cf. Tertull., Apol. xxxix., "Ita fabulantur ut qui sciant Deum audire." Clem. Alex., Strom. vii. 7, 49, ἅπας δὲ ὁ βίος αὐτοῦ πανήγυρις ἁγία αὐτίκα· θυσίαι μὲν αὐτῷ εὐχαί τε καὶ αἶνοι καὶ αἱ πρὸ τῆς ἐστιάσεως ἐντεύξεις τῶν γραφῶν κ. τ. λ.

³ Cf. on the Eulogia, chap. iv.

⁴ Dominicum, cf. supra, p. 101, and de Unit. Eccles. chap. xiv., "Dominicæ hostiæ veritatem per falsa sacrificia profanare."

We find, then, that in the middle of the third century the evidence of the separation of the Agapé from the Eucharist is quite clear in the West, and the similarity of the language used of the Agapé by Eastern and Western writers makes it probable that the general usage was the same in East and West.

In both the Agapé is divided into public and private, in both the religious character of it is still marked, in both the thought of providing for the wants of the poor in connection with the Agapé is still kept in view.

The remainder of the Christian literature of the third century does not seem to furnish any further important evidence on the subject of the Agapé. Gregory Thaumaturgus, Anatolius of Laodicea, Lactantius, and Methodius do not appear to refer to it.¹

¹ Anatolius (Paschal Canon, chap. x.) speaks of the unlawfulness of celebrating "the Lord's mystery of the Passover at any other time but on the Lord's Day, on which the resurrection of the Lord from death took place." Hippolytus (?) Fragm. in Proverb, ix. 1, speaks of "His Body and Blood, which are daily consecrated and offered (ἐπιτελοῦνται θυόμενα) on the mystical and divine table in memorial of the ever-to-be-remembered and first table of the mystical divine supper"—where the reference to the Eucharist alone is clear. Hippolytus (Hæres. ix. 12) mentions Pope Zephyrinus' appointment of a curator over the cemetery at Rome (circ. A.D. 200), which indicates the registration of Christian communities at that date as collegia funeraticia. μεθ' οὗ (Victor) κοίμησιν Ζεφυρίνου τούτου μεταγαγὼν ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἀνθελίου εἰς τὸ κοιμητήριον κατέστησεν. See Hardy, ut infra, p. 194.

The Sibylline Oracles are so obscure in their origin and date as not to be of much practical value for the purpose of this investigation; but, as a good many of the Christian portions are placed by Alexandre in the third century, I subjoin here what he considers to be their allusions or references to the Agapé.

The first is in a kind of apostrophe to the "God-born race" (of Christians):

"But glorious children will bring honour to thee,
And with holy strains a table will set up":¹

a passage which recalls the words of Cyprian as to music in connection with these sacred feasts.

The two next quotations—from the eighth book—Alexandre would associate with the preceding one as to date and authorship:

"Mine image, the possessor of right reason, is Man."²

Or. viii. 402. This, according to Alexandre (Sib. Or. ii. 547) does not refer to the Eucharist, in spite of v. 408,

CHAPTER IV

THE AGAPÉ IN CHURCH ORDINANCES

IN entering on this stage of the enquiry one is confronted by one of the most difficult and perplexing problems of Church history — the problem of the Apostolic Constitutions and their kindred literature. It would be obviously impossible to deal with this problem in general in an enquiry into one particular point, such as the history of the Agapé. All that can be done is to briefly summarise the present state of the question, and to put before the reader such information about the Agapé as the more important documents connected with this literature afford to us. The question is discussed at length in Funk's¹ Die Apostolischen Konstitutionen (1891), and, less fully, by Mr Brightman (Liturgies i. Introduction); but for my immediate purpose it will be sufficient to quote the clear statement of Dr

Armitage Robinson in the Ministry of Deaconesses (1898. Appendix A). "The Apostolic Constitutions is the title of a Greek work in eight books containing regulations for the discipline of the Christian Church. No one now holds that these regulations were drawn up by the Apostles: it is only by a fiction that the Apostles are represented as uttering¹ them. The book in its present form cannot be earlier than the middle² of the fourth century, and may perhaps be as late as the beginning of the fifth century. But fictions of this kind have a great historical value as witnessing to the institutions which existed at the time when they were composed. Thus the Apostolic Constitutions as we have them represent fourth-century manners and customs, coloured to some extent by the ideals which the writer himself cherished in regard to them."

² Bishop Lightfoot, however, says (Apost. Fathers, pt. ii. 1, p. 253), "there is nothing in the Apostolic Constitutions, even in their present form, inconsistent with an earlier date than this, while their silence on questions which interested the Church in the middle and latter half of the fourth century is in itself a strong presumption that they were written before that date."

"But these Constitutions have another and still greater value. Modern research and criticism have shown that they embody far more ancient elements, which can be separated¹ off from the later matter with which they were overlaid by the last writer who gave us the work in its present form."

"Thus books i.-vi. embody an Apostolic Didascalia (or Instruction), which may belong to the middle of the third century. It is preserved to us in a Syriac translation,² and a Latin³ translation has quite recently been discovered of the greater part of it in the under-writing of a palimpsest manuscript at Verona."

"Again, book vii. embodies the Didaché or teaching of the Apostles, as can plainly be seen, now that we have recovered that early work."

³ This is now published by Dr Hauler (Leipsic, 1900).

"Book viii. presents a more difficult problem, but it stands in some relation, not very close, to another early manual called¹ the Canons of Hippolytus."²

Since this was written another kindred document, viz., the Syriac Testamentum Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, has been published in a Latin translation by Mgr. Rahmani.³

I take first, for convenience, what appear to be the ordinary directions for the Agapé as they appear in the Church Order, or Egyptian Canons, the latter part of which,⁴ relating to Church Discipline, is now published by Hauler in the Latin

² And both of these to the Apostolic Canons and Egypt. Can. Reliqq. See Achelis, p. 38 ff.

⁴ Canons, lxxv.-lxxii. See Harnack, Texte u. Untersuch. ii. 2. Hauler (p. vii.) dates it as early as the fourth century.

version, which appears along with that of the Didascalía in the Verona palimpsest.

I have put it, for convenience, in parallel columns with the part of the Canons of Hippolytus relating to the Agapé, and added at the end the sections (164-170) of the Canons of Hippolytus on the subject, which do not appear to be represented in the Church Order (Hauler).

But if (so), taste enough that all may have a taste, and that there may be enough over for the inviter to send of the remains to whomsoever he will, and that he may rejoice in the confidence of the saints.

A comparison of the two documents as to the Agapé seems to indicate that the directions in the Canons of Hippolytus are later, partly because of the ¹ greater fulness of detail in the earlier sections

¹ But the Can. Reliqq. may be an abridgement of the longer form given by Lagarde (cf. infra, p. 118) or of the Can. Hipp. in this part. Cf. Lightfoot, Ignat. i. p. 251. "It is a question of dispute whether the Greek is an enlargement from the short form represented by the Syriac" or vice versa, a statement which may be applied much more widely.

(164-170), partly because of the use of expressions (such as, e.g., in 152, 159, 166), which, in themselves, suggest interpolation, or a later date for the whole document.

But in the parallel portions the varieties do not seem decisive on this latter point. They may only indicate local differences.

Coming to details, we see a general agreement in outline. According to the Canons of Hippolytus, the feast took place on the Lord's Day¹ at the time of the lamp-lighting,² i.e., apparently, it began somewhat later than in Tertullian's time; and after the bishop had prayed over host and guests alike, (the Agapé being, therefore, private), the ceremony commenced with the partaking of the bread of exorcism by the catechumens, or (according to the Canons of Hippolytus) by all. The custom seems to have varied between sending the bread to the catechumens and having them present to eat it before the feast proper.

Then follow rules for conduct at the meal,¹ which emphasize moderation and decorum (the Canons of Hippolytus being here somewhat fuller), and the account of the "apoforetum," which does not appear in the Canons of Hippolytus. The respect due to the clergy, whether bishop, priest, or deacon be present, is emphasized in both documents, the blessing by the president being dwelt on in the Church Order, the distribution by him in the Canons of Hippolytus. In both laymen are reminded of their not being authorised to "bless," or "sign" (with the cross—signet); in both the importance of setting an example to the heathen is enforced. Each account concludes with directions for the special entertainment of widows, which was held earlier, i.e. before dark.

There is little in either description which is inconsistent with the statements either of Clement of Alexandria or even of Tertullian, but the more elaborate directions as to the clergy seem to indicate that these portions at least are not earlier than the latter part¹ of the third century²; and because of their connection with the Apostolic Constitutions, I have thought it best to postpone their consideration to this chapter, where they can be taken in conjunction with the more obviously fourth century documents, such as "the Testament of our Lord," and with the Coptic and Arabic forms of the Egyptian Church Ordinances, the portions of both of which that bear on the Agapé I now subjoin.

¹ The word in the Syriac is not "agapé" but n'yāhāthā, lit. restings ("requies," "refectiones," Schaaf, Syr. Lex. s.v.) It is the Syriac rendering for ἀγάπαις in 2 Peter ii. 13 (Jude 12), and has no connotation such as "funebres" (Rahmani) in earlier Syriac. But the Jewish custom of "the breaking of bread" at funeral feasts, and the "collegia funeraticia" among Christians in the second century (cf. Appendix II. and Hippol., Her. ix. 12, quoted at the end of chap. iii.) make it possible that funeral agapæ were much earlier than there is clear evidence to show. Cf. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, p. 485 ff.

³ Rahmani (p. 200) points out that it is not the Eucharist but the oblation of bread and wine "per modum agapes" that is referred to. Cf. Can. Hipp. 164 ff.

⁴ There is some confusion in the Syriac text here evidently.

We are now in a position to compare all four documents—the Remains of the Egyptian Canons (Hauler), the Canons of Hippolytus, the Egyptian Church Order (Lagarde), and the Testament of our Lord. For convenience I append a table which will show the main points that they have in common, and by the side of it the outline of the order of the Agapé as given by Tertullian.

This comparison makes it clear that, in spite of the elaboration of certain details, the main principles of the true love-feast are still what they were in Tertullian's time.

And it also shows that the additional details given in the Canons of Hippolytus, as compared with the kindred documents, are not inconsistent with a comparatively early date for these Canons, especially as these points are not inconsistent with the accounts of the other documents, though not emphasized in them. And so one may fairly infer that where the "Canons of Hippolytus" are not obviously interpolated, as they are here and there, they present at least as early a picture of the Agapé as the parallel texts.

The mention of the "host" or "inviter" is one great mark of distinction between all these texts and Tertullian. Just as appeared in Clement of Alexandria, the old principle of mutual giving had been departed from, though not of course always,¹ as the love-feast of the community still survived; and in consequence of the change we find consideration for the host emphatically enjoined.

Dr. Achelis thinks that the presence of the bishop, and the lighting of the lamps by the deacon are special features of the *Sunday*² Agapé, and that the rules in § 172 ff. are general directions for all kinds of meals (Mahlzeiten, p. 199).

The latter conception certainly receives additional support from the heading in the Coptic³ version of the Canons (Tattam, p. 66), "Of the time of eating," which comes in just before the section corresponding to Can. Hipp. 172 ff.

The Testament of our Lord is so clearly related to the documents previously quoted, as may be seen by the references in the notes, that it does not call for special comment in this connection.

But the fuller form of the Egyptian Church Order (Lagarde) throws light on some customs which do not appear in the apparently earlier documents.¹ The direction of Section 47 is "Let them receive from the hand of a bishop a fragment of bread before each breaks his own bread. For this is Eulogia and not Eucharist." This suggests comparison with a passage in the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions (chap. xxxi.) :

(xxx. i.) "I, the same (make a constitution) in regard to remainders (περισσευμάτων). Those² εὐλογίαι which remain over and above at the mysteries let the deacons distribute among the clergy according to the decision of the bishop or the presbyters : to a bishop four parts ; to a presbyter three parts ; to a deacon two parts. . . . For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God that everyone be honoured according to his dignity, for the church is the school not of confusion, but of good order."

This statement appears to refer to a time when the offerings which were originally made for the purposes of the Agapé as well as the Eucharist, were formally made during the service, the εὐλογία being the bread offered at the offer-

² The Coptic Version (Tattam, p. 138) has "the Eulogies which remain at the mysteries shall not be set on."

tory, and a gift of the people.¹ There is no evidence here as to the exact relation that still survived between these offerings and the Agapé itself;² but the subsequent development of the εὐλογία into bread formally blessed and³ distributed at the end of the liturgy seems to point to a time when the Agapé had died out, and the εὐλογία in the East and panis benedictus in the West remained as a kind of development or survival of it, and a symbol of the Christian love and unity, which the Agapé itself had emphasized in earlier days.⁴

In the Didascalia (Hauler, p. 38), chap. xxvi, just before the statement about "Agapæ" for the "aniculæ," we find the direction: "offer then your oblations (prosforas) to the priest, either by yourselves or by the deacons (per diacones), (to him) who (quique) will both receive them, and ³ See Hastings' Dict. Bible, s.v. "Love-feast," where "certain points of ritual connected with the Eucharist, such as the offertory, the washing of hands, the kiss of peace, and in the Oriental Church, the distribution among the poor of bread which had been blessed but not consecrated," are traced to the Agapé.

distribute to each one as is fitting." In the Canons of Hippolytus the oblation is also spoken of just before the Agapé (159), and it is said (160) "if the oblation is being distributed, let alms be also distributed to the poor," etc.

There is unfortunately a lacuna in the parallel passage in the Canonum Reliquiæ (Hauler, p. 113) just at this point, but in the Egyptian Ch. Order (47, Lagarde, pp. 469, 470, Tattam, p. 66) the directions for the bishop's distribution, which precede the general rules for an Agapé, are in connection with a meal "in the Church," and the directions for breaking and distributing the bread conclude with the words, "for this is Eulogia and not Eucharist."¹

It may be that in both these places the reference is to a distribution of the Eulogiæ in Church after the Eucharist, which is mentioned just previously (Tattam, p. 64; Can. Hipp. 150-154) in connection with the Baptismal rite. If this be so, perhaps Dr. Achelis² lays too much stress on the breaking and distributing of the bread, as being the most important points in connection with the

² Die Canones Hippolyti, p. 202. C.H. 170, 179, certainly refer to breaking and distributing before the Agapé "antequam considerant." So also 160, 161, 163.

Agapé¹ as described in these documents; but his statements are so noteworthy that I venture to translate them:

"We now come to the most important part of the Agapé—the breaking of the bread, which is what separates the Agapé from ordinary meals and gives it a semi-liturgical (halbgottesdienstlichen) character. Of the scattered notices in the Canons of Hippolytus we take the following: Can. xxxii. 165; xxxiii. 170; xxxiv. 179; xxxv. 181, 182.²"

"1. The breaking of bread is an essential part of all Agapæ, which was never left out.

"2. The highest cleric present performs the act. If none such be there, then a layman.

"3. It is sharply differentiated³ from the Eucharist. Also, if the Eucharist has taken place before, as at the memorial meals (Totenmahlen—ἀναμνήσεις), the breaking of bread follows in its entirety.

"4. It is the solemn (feierliche) introductory act of the Agapé, the only ritual component part of the same.

² But see note 2, supra, p. 132.

³ Cf. p. 229, "The Agapæ are long since separated from the Eucharist in C.H." Cf. C.H. 205, "ne gustet aliquis fidelium nisi antea de mysteriis sumpserit." So Can. Rel. (Hauler) p. 117.

"5. The act consists, if a cleric be present, in a prayer of blessing for those who are there, in which the sign of the cross is made over a loaf; also in the breaking of the bread, and the distribution of it to those present."

"The prayer and the sign of the cross, however, are not essential to the Agapé, they only take place if a cleric be there to fulfil them. The only essentials are the breaking and distribution of the bread."

"6. Those present take the 'bread of exorcism' standing together. Then they seat themselves and begin the actual meal. To the catechumens small pieces are sent. . . ."

When one turns from this description to the text of the *Egyptian Canons*¹ one is struck at once with the difference. The bread of exorcism is mentioned as being "given" (lxxv.), the rite is spoken of as the "oblatio" (lxxv. 6, 7). The "apoforetum" is "offered" (lxxv. 17), but no mention at all is made of either "breaking" or "distributing" the bread as an essential part of the meal.

And similarly in Lagarde's text of the Egyptian Church Ordinances, though the breaking and distribution of the Eulogia is dwelt on (47), in the account of the Agapé there is a like silence as to the bread breaking as an essential act, though "they distribute portions" (50). And so in the Testamentum Domini Nostri, though partaking (? in the breaking) is mentioned once, it is not emphasized.

On the other hand, thanksgiving is mentioned twice in the Canons of Hippolytus (173), "edant . . . cum laude Dei," and in the probably interpolated passage (166), "necessaria est pauperibus εὐχαριστία quæ est in initio missæ."

In the Egyptian Canons (Hauler) thanksgiving is not mentioned at all, apparently; whereas in Lagarde's version thanksgiving before receiving the cup is mentioned (48), and each one is bidden to "eat with thanksgiving in the name of God" (51), besides two mentions of thanksgiving in connection with the first fruits.

The conclusion, then, from a comparison of these documents seems to be that while Dr. Achelis' inference is not excluded by the parallel texts, it is scarcely confirmed by them, and therefore a complete generalisation is hardly warranted. The texts point rather to local variety¹ of usage in connection with the Agapé, along with an underlying substratum of agreement.

In the already quoted passage of the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. c. 20) there is a reference to the custom of first fruits,¹ which is also touched on in the Egyptian Church Order. "The first fruits belong to the priests and to those deacons who minister to them."

This is also mentioned in the second book of the Constitutions in special connection with the Agapé, and at such length that I have placed the passage side by side with that in the Latin text of the Didascalía, which closely resembles it.

Didascalíæ Fragmenta,

To those again who desire to hold an Agapé, and seek for old women (*anículas*²), let him frequently also send (mittat) her whom he knows to be in tribulation.

the Agapæ and distributions ¹ (erogationes, MS. erogationibus) in honour of Almighty God. As then a gift is given to each one of the elder women (presbyterarum v. l. -orum), a double portion shall be given to each deacon in the priesthood (in Sacerdotio) of Christ, but a fourfold portion to him who presides as to the glory of the Almighty. But, if anyone wishes to honour the presbyters as well, let him give a double portion to them as to the deacons; for let them also be honoured as apostles and counsellors of the bishop and the crown of the Church.

And as much as is given to every one of the elder women, let double as much be given to the deacons in honour (εἰς γέρας) of Christ. Let also a double portion be set apart for the presbyters as for such as labour about the word of the ministry (τὸν τῆς διακονίας λόγον) in honour of the Apostles of the Lord whose place they maintain as counsellors of the bishop and crown of the Church.

For they are a Sanhedrim and Senate of the Church. If there be a reader, let him receive a single portion in honour of the prophets, and let the singer and porter have as much.

Before passing from the documents connected with the Apostolic Constitutions the reference to "memorials" or funeral meals must be noticed which appears in the eighth book (chap. xlii.): "Let the third day of those who are at rest be celebrated with psalms and lessons and prayers¹ on account of Him who rose within the space of three days; and let the ninth day be celebrated in remembrance of the living (τῶν περιόντων) and of those that sleep; and the fortieth² day according to the ancient pattern: (for so did the people lament Moses); and the anniversary day (ἐνιαύσια), in memory of him. And let alms be given to the poor out of his goods for a memorial (ἀνάμνησιν) of him"

"XLIV. Now when at the memorials (μνείαις) you are invited, feast (ἐστιάσθε) with good order, and fear of God, as being able even to intercede for the

Being presbyters and deacons of Christ ye ought always to be sober (νήφειν) both among yourselves and among others, so that you may be able to warn the unruly. . . . Nor do we say this only of those of the clergy (τῶν ἐν κλήρῳ), but also of every Christian layman (λαϊκοῦ Χριστιανοῦ)."¹

The corresponding passage in the Canons of Hippolytus (169) runs as follows: "if memorials² (ἀναμνήσεις) take place (memorials do take place) on behalf of those who have departed, let them first partake of the mysteries before they sit down together, but not on the first day (of the week) (170). After the oblation let the bread of exorcism³ be distributed among them."

There does not appear to be any mention of these feasts in the rest of the kindred documents.

The mention of these memorials⁴ in close connection with the Agapé has great interest as confirming the view of the older writers such as Bingham, viz., that¹ such meals were regarded as Agapæ. The particular mention of the celebration of the Eucharist at the beginning of them gives them a special character. Apropos of this Dr. Achelis² dwells on the contrast between the order of the Eucharist and the Agapé, as given here, and that of their early days, and emphasizes the distinction given to these memorials by this practice.

CHAPTER V

THE AGAPÉ IN THE FOURTH CENTURY AND AFTERWARDS

RESUMING now the previous order of the investigation, which has been interrupted by the consideration of the formal directions on the Agapé, I pass on to the more scattered notices or allusions which are to be found in more undoubted writers of the fourth century.

The next statements of importance as to the Agapé come from St. Chrysostom,¹ who says (Hom. xxvii. on 1 Cor.): "As in the case of the three thousand who believed in the beginning, all had eaten their meals in common, and had all things in common. Such was also the practice when the Apostle wrote this; not thus, indeed, exactly (οὐχ οὕτω μὲν μετὰ ἀκριβείας), but as it were a certain outflowing of the communion² (ἀπόρροια τῆς κοινωνίας) abiding among them, descended also to them that came after. And because it came to pass that some were poor and others rich, they laid not down all their goods in the midst, but made the tables open on stated days, as was natural (ὡς εἰκός); and when the meeting (τῆς συνάξεως) was over, after the communion of the mysteries, they all went to a common entertainment (ἐὺωχίαν), the rich bringing their provisions with them, and the poor and destitute being invited by them and all feasting in common (κοινῇ πάντων ἐστιωμένων).¹ But afterwards this custom also became corrupt."

And in another homily (xxii. Oportet hæres—es esse) he says: "From this law and custom (of having all things common) there arose then another admirable custom in the churches. For when all the faithful met together, after hearing the instruction, and after the prayers, and communion of the mysteries, they did not immediately return home, upon the breaking up of the assembly, but the rich and wealthy brought meat from their own houses; and called the poor and made common tables, common dinners, common banquets in the church itself" (κοινὰς ἐποιοῦντο τραπέζας, κοινὰς ἐστιάσεις, κοινὰ συμπόσια ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ).

“And so from this fellowship in eating and the reverence for the place (τῆς εὐλαβείας τῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ τόπου), they were all strictly united in charity one with another, and much pleasure and profit arose thence to them all; for the poor were comforted and the rich reaped the fruits of their benevolence, both from those whom they fed and from God.”

I have elsewhere criticised these statements and their claim to be regarded as a really historical account of apostolic and sub-apostolic practice. But, putting that aspect aside, they seem to give us a—perhaps somewhat idealised—picture of the Agapé in St. Chrysostom’s time, or perhaps rather earlier.

This statement is reproduced in effect by the pseudo-Jerome (in 1 Cor. xi.), who says: “When they met in the church they made their oblations separately; and after the communion, whatever remained of the sacrifices they consumed these in the church, making a common supper together.” And Theodoret¹ speaks similarly (in 1 Cor. xi. 16).

It is clear then that in Chrysostom’s day, and for some time previously, the Agapé had been held in the church;¹ but as to when this practice actually began there does not seem to be clear evidence. Chrysostom's description has a somewhat formal and technical cast, which is obviously very different from the third and second century writers, and which shows him to be somewhat lacking in historical imagination, and to be describing the past somewhat in terms of his own day.

But, in addition to the fact of the Agapé being now held in the church, we see from Chrysostom that in the fourth century its eleemosynary character had become more strongly marked than before; and this is confirmed by the well-known reference² which Julian the Apostate makes to the Agapé in one of his letters (Fragm. Epistolæ ad fin.), where he represents the Galilæans as taking advantage of the neglect of the poor by their own heathen priests to lure them into Christianity, "as a child might be lured by a cake from home on board ship, and so sold into slavery in some foreign part" (διὰ τοῦ πλακοῦντος ἐξαπατῶντες . . . ἐμβάλλοντες εἰς ναῦν ἀπέδοντο . . .). "In the same manner, beginning with their Agapé, as it is called amongst them, and their entertainment and ministry of tables . . . they have led the faithful into atheism" (ἀρξάμενοι διὰ τῆς λεγομένης παρ' αὐτοῖς ἀγάπης καὶ ὑποδοχῆς καὶ διακονίας τραπεζῶν . . . πιστοὺς ἐνήγαγον εἰς ἀθεότητα).¹

This passage bears witness at once to the influence of the Agapé in the fourth century, and to the increasing dangers with which it was surrounded.

From the earliest days of Christianity, as we have seen, these dangers were serious to Christians living in the midst of a corrupt Jewish or heathen civilization, of which clubs and social feasts formed a great part; but in the days of persecution, though scandals might occasionally occur in connection with the Agapé, it was an undoubted bond of union and a strength—above all to the poor or weak brethren, who there mixed on equal terms with the wealthy, and with those who were strong in the faith. But, now that under Constantine official recognition and

And so, now, we find the Church in the Synod of Gangra¹ (circa A.D. 353, Canon xi.) for the first time formally condemning the abuse of the Agapé: "If anyone² despise those who in faith hold Agapæ, and who for the honour of the Lord invite the brethren to meet, and if he be unwilling to take part in these invitations because he holds what takes place in contempt, let him be anathema." . . . "We approve of the Church assemblies as being for the public good, and pronounce a blessing on signal acts of charity done to our brethren."

It was apparently the case of the Eustathians that was specially aimed at. They "moved with pride," despised the assembly of the orthodox, and chose to hold the Agapé for themselves in private houses.

² "Εἰ τις καταφρονῶν τῶν ἐκ πίστεως ἀγάπας ποιούντων καὶ διὰ τιμὴν κυρίου συγκαλούντων τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς, καὶ μὴ ἐθέλοι κοινωνεῖν ταῖς κλήσεσι, διὰ τὸ ἐξευτελίζειν τὸ γινόμενον, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

But in spite of official reproofs the evil side of these entertainments continued to prevail after the time of Constantine, and especially in the Eastern Church, as we see from the statements of Gregory of Nazianzus and Chrysostom himself.

By this time a further development had taken place in the character of the Agapæ, and they had, for a considerable time past, been gradually converted into entertainments which families prepared on the¹ death of relatives, in churches, on the anniversaries of martyrs, and at which clergy and poor were regular guests.

And so Gregory apostrophizes the martyrs in whose honour the feast was held: "Tell us if the assemblies really please you. For what can be more delightful? But for what reason? Is it for the sake of virtue? . . . You, O holy martyrs, call I to witness, these children of lust have changed your honours into a disgrace."²

Μάρτυρες εἴπατε ἄμμιν ἀληθῶς εἰ φίλδον ὑμῖν
Αἱ συνοδοί. . . .

Νῦν δὲ τάρβος ἔχει με, ἀκούσατε ὦ φιλόκωμοι, πρὸς τοὺς δαιμονικοὺς αὐτομολεῖτε τύπους.

And again (Orat. vi. 4 ff.) he says: "Let us also offer our bodies and souls a living sacrifice. . . . If we gather ourselves together in this way; so shall we keep the feast day as will give pleasure to Christ and honour to the martyrs. If, however, we come together to satisfy the belly and to enjoy the changing and fleeting pleasures, and so turn this place of temperance into a place of gluttony and satiety. . . . I do not see how our conduct corresponds with the occasion."

And similarly St. Chrysostom, in spite of the somewhat ideal picture of the Agapé he had elsewhere given, is obliged to caution the guests¹ (Hom. xlvii., Panegyric on Julian the Martyr):

"If thou desirest the enjoyment of pleasure now as well, what is more enjoyable than this assembly? What more graceful, than the spectacle which is spiritual (θεάτρον τοῦ πνευματικοῦ), than thy own strains² (τῶν μελῶν τῶν σῶν); than the fellowship (συνουσίας) with the brethren? But wouldest thou participate in a bodily table as well? There it is lawful, after the breaking up of the assembly (σύλλογον), to take one's ease (καταλύσαντι) under a vine or fig-tree near the monument of the martyr, and to allow the body relaxation, and yet secure the conscience from condemnation (τὸ συνειδὸς ἀπαλλάξαι καταγνώσεως). For the martyr sees you close by, and, being near and standing by the very table, he does not allow the enjoyment to resolve itself (ἐκχυθῆναι) into sin, but as a tutor or most excellent father, being looked on with the eye of faith, he restrains (καταστέλλει) the mirth, he cuts off all extravagant pleasures," etc.

And these warnings were not confined to Eastern writers. There are similar complaints from the African Church, such as that of the author of the treatise de Duplici Martyrio, which is sometimes ascribed to St. Cyprian, but is evidently a later work. "Drunkenness¹ (he says) has become in our Africa to such an extent a custom, that men hardly consider it a sin. Do we not see that one Christian is pressed by another to drink himself full at the memorials of the martyrs. . . . Is this to be regarded as a lesser sin than to offer a goat to Bacchus?"

And similarly St. Augustine (Epist. xxii., ad Aurelium, chap. vi.) says: "Those debaucheries and lavish banquets in cemeteries are usually believed by a sensual and ignorant populace (imperita plebes) to be not only commemorations (honores) of martyrs, but even consolations to the dead (solatia mortuorum)." And again (contra Faustum, xx. 20) "Our love-feasts feed the poor either with vegetable food or meat—commonly at love-feasts, even meats are expended (erogantur) on the poor." ¹

Indeed, both in East and West, there seems to have been a tendency on the part of the ignorant populace to confuse these Agapæ with the heathen Parentalia and sacrificial festivals;² so much so that St. Augustine himself speaks as if these Christian memorial feasts had been appointed as a substitute for those heathen banquets. "When," he says,³ "on the establishment of peace after the persecutions, crowds of heathen, who desired to come under the name of Christians, were hindered by the fact that, being used to spend festal days with their idols in abundant feasting and debauchery, they could not easily refrain from these pleasures, our ancestors determined that in the meantime forbearance should be shown for this part of their weakness, and that in place of (post) those they were surrendering, other festal days should be celebrated in honour of holy martyrs, at least not with similar profanity (sacrilegio), if with similar display.”¹

And St. Basil² (Regula Major, qu. xl.) speaks of sellers in the sanctuary on festivals of martyrs trafficking in what was necessary for the feasts.

And so we arrive at the beginning of the sad end of this beautiful and characteristically Christian custom of love-feasts, when the Church itself was obliged to discountenance them, and forbid their celebration in sacred buildings. The Council of Laodicea (circa A.D. 363) enacts (Canon 28) that³ “it is not lawful to hold the so-called Agapæ in the Churches, or assemblies, and to eat, or set out couches in the house of God."

"The so-called Agapæ"—what a melancholy development of that which seems to have been originally an outcome of the "καινή ἐντολή ἵνα ἀγαπάτε ἀλλήλους!" But after all it was the Eucharist and not the Agapé that was of Divine institution, and so it was the Eucharist—the Institution of Him "Who knew what was in man," and not the Agapé, which man had, with the best intentions, added to the Eucharist, that survived.

The subsequent history of the Agapé will need only to be briefly summarised.¹

Henceforward Agapæ were regularly celebrated in the East, e.g. in Antioch, beside the place dedicated to martyrs.²

By the end of the fourth century they seem to have died out of most parts of the Western Church, as St. Augustine tells us (Ep. xxii. ad Aurelium, chap. iv.): "Throughout the greater part of Italy, and in all or almost all other churches beyond the sea they had either not been celebrated at all, or if they had arisen or become customary, they were put an end to and abolished after careful consideration by the Bishops.”¹

St. Ambrose, e.g. had prohibited them at Milan, as St. Augustine tells us (Confess. vi. 2) in order that no opportunity for debauchery might be given to the intemperate, and “because this kind of Parentalia (illa quasi Parentalia) resembled very closely the superstition of the heathen.”

Paulinus of Nola is our chief authority for customs which prevailed elsewhere in Italy in his day, and he mentions how at Rome, Alethius entertained all the poor in the Basilica of St. Peter at the funeral of his wife. At Nola, Paulinus did his utmost to put an end to the practice of commemorative feasting in the Church of St. Felix.²

In Africa such festivals seem still to have been universal; but St. Augustine used his influence against them, as he tells us (Epistola xxii. ad Aurelium, chap. vi.), at first by urging Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, against them, and subsequently by his own action, at Hippo, which he describes¹ at considerable length. "And I added an harangue in order to show with what unusual heat and vehemence our Lord drove out of the temple drunken revellings (ebriosa convivia)," etc.

And, finally, the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397, Canon xxx.) enacted that "no bishops or clergy should hold banquets in a church unless it should happen that the needs of hospitality required that they should take refreshment there when on a journey. And that their flocks should also, as far as possible, be debarred from entertainments of this kind."²

In the Eastern churches the Agapæ seem to have survived somewhat longer without further general condemnation.

Theodoret, for instance (A.D. circ. 429, Hist. Eccl. iii. 11) speaks of certain martyrs being honoured by a yearly feasting (μέχρι δὲ τήμερον ἐτησίῳ δημοθωίᾳ γεραίρονται). But in A.D. 692 the Trullan or "Quinisextan" Council (Canon 74) under Justinian II. repeated the Canon of Laodicea¹ against them, with the additional words, "those who dare to do this must either cease, or be excommunicated" (ἀφοριξέσθωσαν).

But in the Western Church the last extant enactment against them is as early as A.D. 541, in the Second Council of Orleans (chap. xii. Labbe iv. p. 1781): "That no one is to perform his devotions in a church with singing or drinking or wantonness, for by such devotion God is not pleased but rather incensed."²

Yet, in spite of restrictions and prohibitions, it was long before the Agapé finally died out. And in its later days it developed into a variety of forms which call for notice.

Theodoret (Græc. Affect. Curatio Diss. viii., circa 437 A.D.), speaks of Agapæ in connection with commemoration³ feasts as taking the place of such festivals as the Dionysia: "the ceremonies (δημοθοιναί) of Peter and Paul and Thomas, etc., are gone through, and in place of the ancient procession (πομπείας) and disgraceful obscenity of word and deed, temperate gatherings are celebrated (σώφρονες ἑορτάζονται πανηγύρεις), involving not drunkenness and revelling and laughter, but divine hymns, and the hearing of sacred oracles (λογίων), and prayers enhanced with commendable tears (ἄξιεπαίνοις κοσμουμένην δακρύοις).¹

And Gregory of Nazianzus speaks (Ep. i. 14)² of such feasts in connection with marriages.

The custom of Agapæ in connection with funerals has been mentioned before. It was originally³ in all probability a grafting, so to speak, of the Christian Agapé upon the immemorial custom of funeral feasts; and how far the distinctive features of the Agapæ survived in this it is not possible to determine; but several Western writers of this period speak of such feasts in much the same terms as they apply to the Agapé proper. St. Augustine, for instance (De Moribus Eccles. cxxxiv.), says: "I know many who adore tombs and pictures, I know many who drink most lavishly over the dead, and who, setting forth banquets before corpses, dig their own graves over those who have been brought to the grave (super sepultos se ipsos sepeliant), and who put their own acts of gluttony and excess down to the account of religion."

² Cf. also Greg. Nazianz., Epist. lvii. (ccxciii.) and ccxxxii. (cxciii.).

³ It has been questioned whether these funeral and memorial feasts were Agapæ at all. My reasons for thinking that they were are briefly these, in addition to the evidence given above, p. 138: (1) That legalisation of sodalicia "religionis causa" naturally would dispose the Christians in early times to shelter their Agapæ under the wing of collegia funeraticia, which all had feasts. (See Appendix II.) (2) That Tertullian in his description of the Agapé (Apol. xxxix.) distinctly dwells on the "arca," which was common to the Christian "corpus" with the heathen collegium, as expended "egenis alendis humanisque." (Cf. ad Martyr: 1. Inter cetera alimenta, beati martyres designati, etc., and de Jej. chap. 12, and the idea of alms-giving in connection with burials survives in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 42), quoted above). (3) That the language applied to these feasts is very similar to that used of the Agapé, though the word Agapé is scarcely ever applied to them. Cf. Constantine, Orat. ad Sanct. chap. xii., σωφρονέστατα δε πολλῶν καὶ

τὰ συμπόσια πρὸς ἔλεον καὶ ἀνακτῆσιν τῶν δεομένων καὶ πρὸς βοήθειαν τῶν ἐκπεσόντων. See Bingham, bk. xx. chap. vii.; Cave, Primitive Christianity, chap. viii.; Dict. Christ. Antiqq. s.v. "Cemetery." Prof. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i., 119, says: "The Christians were the dominant class in most Phrygian cities after 200. They registered themselves as "collegia tenuiorum" (Dig. 47, 22), and accommodated themselves in all possible ways to the Roman law." Some of the inscriptions given by Prof. Ramsay tend to confirm the above view, e.g. Nos. 455-7 (Cities and Bishoprics, p. 562), where Aristeas gives a piece of ground to a Christian burial and benefit society on certain conditions.

rum sanctitate," adds: "Methinks I see all those crowds of the poor (miserandæ) populace, those nurslings of divine piety gathered together into the magnificent (amplissimam) basilica of the glorious Peter, and so carefully disposed in companies (per accubitus), and all being fed with abundance of food (profluis . . . cibis)."¹

And, lastly, there is mention of religious feasts in connection with dedication festivals, which by the time of Gregory² of Nazianzus had become an "ancient usage" (ἐγκαίνια τιμαῖσθαι παλαιὸς νόμος); but which gradually had grown more licentious, until at the beginning of the seventh century we find Gregory³ the Great writing to Mellitus, who was about to join Augustine in England, and, in order to check the popular tendency to idolatry, "allowing that, as some solemnity must be conceded as a compensation for the transformation of the heathen temples into Christian churches, and the abolition of the sacrifices, these festivals should be observed on the anniversaries of the day of the dedication,"

when, he suggests, "after killing cattle to the praise of God, they should celebrate the solemnity with religious feasting."¹

In conclusion it may be well to gather up very briefly the somewhat scattered threads of this discussion, so as to present the main results of it in a convenient form.

The attempt made (Introd.) to investigate to some extent the environment—heathen and Jewish—in which the love-meals grew up, showed, with regard to the former, that both secular and religious associations, either Greek, Roman, or Oriental in origin, and usually involving common meals, were prevalent throughout the Roman Empire during the period when the Agapé arose; and that these associations were, in some cases, not without morally beneficial results; but that there is not sufficient evidence to prove that they were on the same moral plane with these Christian love-meals; and that therefore they were unlikely to have had any direct influence on their origin (cf. App. I. C, p. 179), though they paved the way, so to speak, for their development, and subsequently exercised a corrupting effect upon them (pp. 18, 19). On the other hand, a survey of the history of Jewish common meals, anterior to and contemporary with the rise of the Agapé (pp. 20-35), showed that they differed essentially from the all-embracing character of the Christian love-feast, in that they were primarily for purposes of exclusion (p. 34) or of ceremonial purity (p. 31); but, nevertheless, that the sacrificial and symbolical significance of common meals (pp. 22, 23) had its roots so deep in the Hebrew character that it could not be without effect on the relations of Christ to His disciples. Not only did our Lord's identification of the Apostles with Himself express itself in a constant table-fellowship (p. 37), but He repeatedly spoke of His Kingdom under the image of a Supper (pp. 36, 37). And this symbolism naturally survived and developed in the infant Christian community in the shape of common meals (pp. 39-42). The idea of oneness in Christ thus expressed found its culmination in the special Commemoration¹ instituted

¹ Dr. P. Gardner (Exploratio Evangelica, p. 461) says that "there is no proof that Jesus intended to institute a Lord's by Christ Himself in the Eucharist (pp. 45 and 47). The sacrificial character of this Institution is not so strongly emphasised in the Gospels as by St. Paul (p. 38, n. 2, App. I. A, p. 165); but the Institution cannot, on any showing, be altogether divorced from its sacrificial surroundings, or from the gradual propaideia which led up to it (App. I. A, p. 165 n.); and, though the Agapé and the Eucharist were at first united, inter alia the language of St. Paul indicates that from the first Supper," and that "the Christian Sacrament, as we know it, represents the early Christian custom of the common meal mixed with an infusion of sacrificial mysticism, probably due to Paul." But taking the Synoptists' account (even apart from the doubtful words in St. Luke) it is steeped in sacrificial associations. "The influence of the idea of the Lamb," e.g. (Isa. liii. 7), "in shaping the Messianic hope of Judaism, cannot be over-estimated" (Hastings' Dict. Bible, s.v. Lamb. Cf. John i. 29, 36; 1 Pet. i. 19; John vi. 35, 53, 54, and Stier Reden Jesu, E. T., vii. p. 77). As, however, the lamb is not mentioned in the Synoptists, its significance cannot perhaps be pressed. But for the sacrificial significance of bread and wine see further Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, part ii. pp. 76 and 200; Maclear, Evidential Value of the Holy Eucharist, p. 51 ff., p. 73 ff.; also Hastings' Dict. Bible, s.v. Lord's Supper. And, even putting aside the Synoptists' account, there is no reason to distrust St. Paul's (probably earlier) statement (1 Cor. xi. 23 ff.), which, if unhistorical and merely 'ecstatic,' could easily have been discredited by some of those present at the Last Supper. If the Eucharist was a mere development of the common meal, why did both survive so long in the Church? See also Dr. Sanday in Hastings' Dict. Bible, ii. p. 638, and reff. there; and supra, p. 22.

there was some distinction between the two (pp. 38, n. 2 ; 43, n. 5 ; 48). The early and apparently natural separation of the two would otherwise be difficult to account for, on the supposition, i.e., that every common meal, and the whole of every such meal, was an Eucharist from the first (p. 43, n. 5).

The seeds which bore fruit in this separation already appear in the description in 1 Corinthians (App. I. C, pp. 47, 50), though whether the feast described there was called an Agapé is somewhat uncertain (App. I. C). The evidence of the Didaché seems to show the two meals still in union, whether this was normal or not (pp. 31, 32, 53, 53, n. 4). But Pliny's letter to Trajan (112 A.D.) is commonly taken as indicating that the separation took place then, or not long previously (p. 59 and n. 2, p. 56, n. 3, pp. 187, 196), at least in parts of the Church. The silence of Justin (c. 140 A.D.) and Irenæus (177 A.D.) as to the Agapé hardly seems conclusive (p. 61, App. II. 197, n. 2) as to its non-existence at Rome and in Gaul respectively (cf. 61 and App. II. pp. 190 ff.) in their time, in view of the strong and apparently representative statement of Tertullian, though it may indicate that, owing perhaps partly to the varying enforcement of the law against associations in different parts of the Empire, the development of the Agapé was not uniform (App. II. pp. 188, 196, n. 3). But, by the end of the second or beginning of the third century, the Agapé, as a distinctive ceremony, seems to have been in vogue in East and West alike (chaps. ii. and iii., especially p. 104). The exact relation of the Agapé to the legal enactments of the Roman Emperors at this period is uncertain, but there is some indication of its legalisation in connection with the collegia funeraticia (p. 104 n., p. 156 n. 3, p. 189 n. p. 199 n.)

At this time there also appears to be some uncertainty as to the separation of the Eucharist from the Agapé in parts of the Egyptian Church (chap. iii. pp. 79, 90-3); but the directions as to the Agapé in the literature of the Apostolic Constitutions represent the differentiation as clear in Syria and Egypt generally, in the fourth century, if not in the latter part of the third; and the general agreement, at least in outline, between these documents, and the statements of Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria as to the love-feast seems to indicate that the separation of the two rites was almost universal (p. 126 ff.).

At the same time a comparison of these documents with each other points to a good deal of local variety in the ritual of these common meals (chap. iv. pp. 126-9).

The further history of the Agapé, as gathered from undoubted writers of the fourth century, and afterwards (chap. v.), unfolds a sad picture of gradual decay, partly consequent on the increasing admixture of Christianity with pagan elements, which its official recognition in the Roman Empire tended to promote.

APPENDIX I

(TO CHAPTER I)

IN seeking to explain the passage on the assembly in 1 Cor. xi., I have been led to the same conclusion as Bishop Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers, vol. ii. sect. 1, p. 313), viz. "that in the Apostolic Age the Eucharist formed part of the Agapé. The original form of the Lord's Supper¹ as it was instituted by Christ was thus in a manner kept up. This appears from 1 Cor. xi. 17 e.g. (comp. Acts xx. 7), from which passage we infer that the celebration of the Eucharist came, as it naturally would, at a later stage in the entertainment.”¹

¹ Dr. Armitage Robinson (Encycl. Biblica, s.v. Eucharist), in view of the uncertainty as to whether the Last Supper was a Passover Supper, warns us against being dominated in our conception of the original institution by the consideration of the elaborate ceremonial of the Passover celebration, and he connects the institution rather with "the simpler formula which accompanied the ordinary Jewish meals." But see Bp. J. Wordsworth, Holy Communion, p. 14 ff., and the reff. there; Harnack, Texte, etc., vii., ii. 137.

But this statement is at variance with the well-known passage in St. Chrysostom (on 1 Cor., Homil. xxvii.), who says that “when the solemn service (τῆς συνάξεως) was completed, after the communion of the mysteries, they all went to a common entertainment, the rich bringing their provisions with them, and the poor and destitute being invited by them, and all feasting in common. But afterwards this custom also became corrupt.”²

Some modern writers, relying on Chrysostom’s statement, maintain either that from the first the Eucharist preceded the Agapé, or — somewhat strangely in view of Chrysostom’s own words — that there was no direct connection between the Eucharist and the Agapé. Mr. Homersham Cox,³ e.g., boldly declares, in spite of the evidence adduced above, that “there is not the slightest reference in ancient writers to a combination of the Eucharist and the Agapé.”

² See also Chrysostom’s Homily, “Oportet hæreses esse” (Benedictine Ed., vol. iii. p. 244), and Theophylact in 1 Cor. xi. 17. Cf. chap. v., supra, and Bingham, bk. xv. chap. vii.

³ First Century of Christianity, p. 312.

But apart from the very strong presumption that, in the absence of express direction to the contrary (of which there is no evidence), the Apostles would have followed the order of the original Institution, the considerations adduced, and the emphasis of St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 25) on the institution of the cup being μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι¹ cannot be so lightly set aside. Moreover, the extreme simplicity and the untechnical character of the language applied to the Eucharist in the Acts scarcely leave room for doubt, in spite of Chrysostom's statement, which was made probably not earlier than 387 A.D.,² that the view taken in the text is the true one. By Chrysostom's time the custom of early celebrations and fasting

¹ The normal order of a Greek δειπνον would not be inconsistent with this. The πρῶται τράπεζαι included the whole of what we consider the meal, and wine was not drunk till the δεύτεραι τράπεζαι, when, after a libation to the "good spirit" (ἀγαθοῦ δαίμονος), the guests drank from their first cup to Διὸς Σωτήρος. The δειπνον of St. Paul might correspond in order to the δεύτεραι τράπεζαι, the πρῶται for satisfying hunger (1 Cor. xi. 34) having presumably been eaten at home. Cf. Xenoph., Symp. ii. 1; Plato, Symp. chap. iv.; and Smith's Dict. Antiqq. s.v. "Cœna." Cf. Prof. Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, p. 485; St. Paul the Traveller, p. 208. "The Christian lived in externals much as before." . . . "It took centuries for Christianity to disengage itself from its surroundings, and to remake society and the rules of life."

Communion had become so ingrained into the life of the Church that to an uncritical mind it might well seem incredible that things had ever been otherwise, whereas recent historical criticism points to the conclusion that the practice of Chrysostom's time was due, not to immemorial custom or direct Divine precept, but to the communis sensus of the Catholic Church based on a sad experience of the abuse of the original practice.¹

Dr. John Lightfoot, whose opinion is always worthy of respect, owing to his learning, strongly questions the "more general opinion" that the Agapæ were solemn assemblies which every congregation had, and at which they ate together at receiving the Sacrament, "some think instantly before, some after ;" ² and he urges that what St. Paul condemns in 1 Cor. xi. is "not only nor so much the misdemeanours at these suppers as the suppers themselves," and he declares that the Agapæ were really the entertainment of strangers,³ though he is "far from denying that some Agapæ were used as appendages to the Lord's Supper in more ancient ages of the Church, but whether in the times of the Apostles we ask, and whether Jude means such we very much doubt." . . .

² Sermon on Jude 12, Works, Ed. Pitman, vi. 232 ff. Cf. on 1 Cor. xi., vol. ii. p. 525.

³ Cf. Rom. xvi. 1 and 23.

"¹ Those Agapæ we suppose were when strangers were hospitably entertained in each Church, and that at the cost of each Church. And we are of opinion that this laudable custom was derived from the synagogues of the Jews. In these synagogues they neither eat nor drink—but there was a place near the synagogue in which they were wont to sleep and eat."²

But though, as we have seen, the Jewish custom offers points of contact with the subsequent developments of the Agapé in the Christian Church, there is no trace of such ξενοδοχία in the evidence I have above adduced.³

The N.T. passages quoted in support of this view, are: Acts xviii. 7 (Paul), "departed thence and went into the house of a certain man named Titus

² Gloss. in Bava Bathra, fol. 3, 2. See also L., vol. iii. p. 274.

Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue" (οὗ ἡ οἰκία ἦν συνομοροῦσα τῇ συναγωγῇ); Rom. xvi. 1, 2, "Phæbe a servant of the Church . . . a succourer (προστάτις) of many"; and 1 Tim. v. 10, εἰ ἐξενδοόχησεν, εἰ ἀγίων πόδας ἔνιψεν. But as a matter of fact there is little or no trace of this form in the organization of Christian charity in the ¹Apostolic or Sub-Apostolic Age; and the straitened and harassed circumstances of the infant Church would have obviously made any such institutions difficult, if not impossible. Such hospitality was evidently left to the generosity of individuals at first, as we see, e.g., from Rom. xii. 23: "Gaius, ὁ ξένος μου καὶ ὅλης τῆς ἐκκλησίας."²

The meaning of the term κυριακὸν δεῖπνον in 1 Cor. xi. has been so much disputed, that it seems to require a brief discussion.

² See further in Uhlhorn's Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, chap. iv., Suicer Thesaurus, s.v. ξενοδοχεῖον, πτωχεῖον, etc.

A recent¹ writer seeks to prove that in 1 Cor. xi. κυριακὸν refers to God the Father, but with an apparently strange want of reference to the immediate context (vv. 23, 24) in which St. Paul says that he received "from the Lord" (ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου) . . . that the Lord (ὁ κύριος) Jesus . . . took bread . . . and likewise also the cup after supper (μετὰ τὸ δειπνῆσαι); and throughout the chapter, and indeed in the majority of cases through the Epistle² both κύριος and ὁ κύριος seem to refer to the Lord Jesus. In the only other passage³ in the New Testament in which the adjective κυριακὸς occurs, it apparently refers to the commemoration of the day on which it was declared with power that Jesus is Lord, Sunday, according to Justin Martyr (Apol. i. chap. lxvii.), being "the day on which we hold our common assembly because . . . Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead." But, though Bishop Lightfoot (on Ignatius, Ep. ad Magnes. p. 129) thinks this interpretation doubtful, at any rate St Paul's own use of the expression "the day of the Lord" (1 Cor. v. 5, and 2 Cor. i. 14)

³ Rev. i. 10, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's (κυριακῇ) day."

refers not to the Father, but to the Son. There does not appear to be anything in the Old Testament use of κύριος or κυριακός,¹ there is certainly nothing in the LXX usage of κύριος, to counterbalance these considerations. Nor in the face of them does St. Paul's quotation of "the table of the Lord" (τράπεζα κυρίου) from Mal. i. 7 seem to be conclusive to the contrary.

The word δεῖπνον is in itself of course not necessarily restricted to an evening or night meal,² but the evident allusion to the Paschal Supper in this passage (1 Cor. xi.) as well as the fact that the Jewish sacrificial meals were usually held in the evening leave no doubt as to the connotation of the term here.³

But the question which more nearly concerns us is, whether the expression κυριακὸν δεῖπνον refers to the Eucharist alone, or to the Agapé, or includes both. If the view taken in the text be correct, viz., that the Agapé culminated in, or at any rate preceded the Eucharist, the context seems undoubtedly in favour of the third meaning. "If," the Apostle says in effect, "you disgracefully abuse even the Agapé, it is impossible for you to eat a true Lord's Supper" or, with the alternative rendering: "it is not really to eat a Lord's Supper that you come together"—a supper, i.e., which like the first Lord's Supper¹ culminated in the supreme act of eating and drinking the Lord's Body and Blood. And, on the whole, this sense seems to harmonise best with the context.

Mr. Scudamore (Dict. Christian Antiqq., s.v. Lord's Supper) suggests that the title included the Agapé at first, "partly in order to veil the Sacrament from unbelievers, partly owing to the language of St. Paul (1 Cor. xi.) being so understood."

The fact, which I have not seen noticed by any other writer, that the *Canons of Hippolytus*² (172) speak of "the Lord's Agapæ" (κυριακαῖς agapis) seems strongly to support Mr. Scudamore's¹ view as to meaning of κυριακὸν δεῖπνον. Though the Canons are obviously interpolated in places, the expression in question is extremely unlikely to have occurred to any later interpolator.

² Cf. chap. iv. supra and the parallel passage in the Canonum Reliquiæ (Hauler) "Cena Dominica," p. 106.

The subsequent usage of the term "Supper" or "Lord's Supper" seems to have varied somewhat curiously. In the second century the term "our supper" is applied to the Agapé by Tertullian (Apologet. chap. xxxix.), who also applies it, apparently, to the Eucharist "cæna Dei" (Spectac. 13), and "convivium Dominicum" (Ad Uxor. ii. chap. 4). In the third century it is applied to the Eucharist by Hippolytus.² But in the fourth century the term has two senses, either, as in St. Basil:³ "we are instructed neither to eat an ordinary supper in church, nor to do dishonour to the Lord's Supper" (by celebrating it in a house); or, especially in the Western Church, for the⁴ Commemorative Supper on Maundy-Thursday, on which the Agapé was celebrated with the Eucharist.

And the survival of this latter custom seems an additional proof that the Agapé and Eucharist were originally combined.

C

In the text, following Bishop Lightfoot, Bingham (bk. xv. chap. vii. 6), who speaks of "a Feast of Charity which all the Ancients reckon an Apostolical rite accompanying the Communion," and others, I have spoken of the Supper referred to in 1 Cor. xi. as if it were an Agapé. But I have been asked "why are we to speak of the Corinthian Eucharist as an Agapé? It was a Supper, of course. But had the idea and name of Agapé already come into being?" To this I reply (i) that, if the considerations mentioned in the Introduction and in the earlier part of chap. i. are of any value, one would expect to find the idea present to the mind of the earliest Christians, whether Jewish or Gentile; (ii) that the supper mentioned by St. Paul is not a mere ordinary social meal, nor yet, of course, a Eucharist solely, as the eating of food other than the elements is indicated by St. Paul, but a religious meal. This is clear from v. 20, where it is called "a Lord's Supper," and from v. 21,

“for in your eating each one taketh before other his own supper, and vv. 33, 34, “wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, wait for one another. If any man is hungry let him eat at home,” where consideration for others is emphasized, and where it is plain that the primary object of the meal is not the mere satisfying of hunger or social enjoyment; (iii) that in the passages quoted from the Epistles of Jude (12) and 2 Peter (ii. 13), the same faults are rebuked, viz., selfishness and excess¹ (ἀφόβως ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες, and ἐντρυφῶντες) at feasts which are expressly called Agapæ; (iv) that there seems to be no reason to believe that these common feasts, as practised at Corinth, were seriously different in kind from those in use elsewhere, or from the common meals indicated in Acts, and frequently referred to by subsequent writers; (v) that as to the name Agapé it is, of course, impossible to prove that it was in use at Corinth in St. Paul’s time. It seems to have been in use in the Christian Church at anyrate as early¹ as between 60 and 80 A.D. ; but I have no doubt that at least the germ of the practice of Agapæ appears in 1 Cor., though not perhaps the liturgical developments, which appear, e.g., in the Didaché (chap. x.) in connection with it.

All that we know of the Hellenic character as exemplified at Corinth would lead one to expect that the idea of a common feast would develop at least as rapidly there as in Christian communities in other parts of the Roman Empire. Neander (History of the Planting of Christianity, E.T., i. p. 249) well remarks : " There existed among the Greeks an ancient custom of holding entertainments at which each one brought his food with him, and consumed it alone. The Agapæ in the Corinthian Church were conducted on the plan of this ancient custom, although the peculiar object of the institution was so different ; consequently the distinction of rich and poor was rendered peculiarly prominent; and the rich sometimes indulged in excesses which desecrated the character of these meetings."

The συνπόσια φιλικὰ here referred to are described by Xenophon, Memorabilia, iii. 14: "Now, when in the case of those who came together for a supper, some brought but little in the way of dainties (ὄψον), and others much, Socrates bade the attendant (παῖδα) either put the smaller quantity into the common stock, or distribute to each his share (of this). Accordingly those who brought the large supply were ashamed at having no share in that which was being put into the common stock, and at not putting in their own in return. So, then, they put their own supply into the common stock; and when they had no more than those who brought but a little with them (φερομένων), they came to stop buying dainties at a high price.

And he (Socrates) used to say that to have good fare (τὸ εὖωχεῖσθαι) was called eating (ἐσθίειν) in the Athenians' language; whereas the good (fare) depended on (τὸ δὲ εὖ προσκεῖσθαι ἐπὶ τῷ . . . ἐσθίειν) eating such things as would not be injurious either to mind or body, and as were not hard to procure. And so he used to use the expression "to have good fare" (τὸ εὖωχεῖσθαι . . . ἀνετίθει) of those who fared moderately (κοσμίως διαιτωμένοις)."

There is, unfortunately, no contemporary epigraphic evidence at Corinth to illustrate the statements of I Corinthians. Dr. Ziebarth¹ quotes a reference from Suidas to a thiasus of Kotys a "dæmon who presides over iniquities"; it was apparently a purely religious society. But Professor Ramsay has shown in his recent Historical Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians (xxxi.) that "Corinth was a favourable soil for the growth of associations and clubs of every kind," as being the greatest international centre of Greece; and, further, that one of the most important questions for Christians was whether they "might still join in the common meals which constituted a leading feature in the ceremonial binding each of these clubs into a unity."

He throws important light on I Cor. x. 14 from the formula pronounced by partakers of the mysteries, viz., "I have eaten of the holy dish, I have drunk from the sacred cup," as showing that St Paul regarded the Eucharistic Meal and the Common Meal of the Pagan societies as two hostile ideas—"ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of Dæmonic powers: ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of Dæmonic powers."

The closeness of the bond which united such societies is brought out in the words of an inscription at Smyrna: οἱ συμβιωτὰ καὶ συμμύσται (Ziebarth, pp. 52, 206).

Dr. Armitage Robinson (Encycl. Biblica, p. 1425) summarises the causes of separation of the Eucharist from a common meal as (1) the difficulties connected with the gradual increase of numbers, which would interfere with reverent celebration; (2) disorders, such as were afterwards discountenanced in the Canons of Hippolytus; (3) the rapid expansion of the liturgical accompaniments of the Eucharist (cf. Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. chap. lix., etc.); (4) the restriction of the Eucharist as the symbol of unity to occasions when the bishop, or his deputy, could celebrate it.

Quod non tantum in Urbe sed in Italia et in provincia locum habere Divus quoque Severus rescripsit. Sed religionis causa coire non prohibentur: dum tamen per hoc non fiat contra senatus consultum, quo illicita collegia prohibentur. Non licet autem amplius

¹ Sodalitas or sodalitium meant originally table-fellowship, then sacred brotherhood (cf. ἐπαρος). In the later Republic it was used for unions dangerous to the State (cf. e.g. the Lex Licinia). Under the Empire the words changed their meaning and became quite harmless, being used synonymously with collegia as here. Cf. Corpus Inscr. Lat. vi. 612, "collegium sodalicium," and vi. 10231.

Collegium was originally the technical word for guilds, while corpus was the recognised expression for a lawful corporation with the privileges of a person with legal rights (cf. Gaius on preceding page). Later, corpus and collegium became interchangeable. Liebenam, p. 164 ff; cf. Mommsen, de Coll. et Sodal., pp. 1 and 117; cf. supra, p. 10, notes 2 and 3.

Sed hæc lex videtur ex lege Solonis translata esse, nam illic ita est:—'Εὰν δὲ δῆμος ἢ φράτορες ἢ ἱερῶν ὀργίων ἢ ναῦται ἢ σύσσιτοι ἢ ὁμόταφοι, ἢ θιασῶται ἢ ἐπὶ λείαν † οἰχόμενοι ἢ εἰς ἐμπορίαν, ὅτι ἂν τούτων, διαθῶνται πρὸς ἀλλήλους κύριον εἶναι, εἰ μὴ ἀπαγορεύσῃ δημόσια γράμματα.

So far for the general view of the Republican and Imperial legislation on the subject. As to Imperial legislation we find more specific statements in ¹ It is clear that sodalicia and collegia included fellowships for religious purposes, burial unions, and trade guilds. Cf. Liebenam, pp. 16, 17.

Suetonius' Life of Julius Cæsar (chap. xlii.), "Cuncta collegia præter antiquitus constituta distraxit."

Casaubon's note on the passage says: "Quæ paucis ante annis P. Clodius tribunus pl. lege lata partim restituerat, sub S. C. novem annis prius facto . . . partim nova adjecerat ex omni fæce urbis ac servitio. Cicero, Asconius, Dio, alii."

Again in the Life of Augustus (chap. xxxii.), "Plurimæ factiones titulo collegii novi ad nullius non facinoris societatem coibant. Igitur grasatores . . . inhibuit: collegia præter antiqua et legitima dissolvit."

This is illustrated by an Inscription (Corp. Inscr. Lat. vi. 2193) which mentions a "collegium symphoniacorum," "quibus senatus coire convocari, cogi permisit e lege Julia ex auctoritate . . . Augusti ludorum causa." And similarly we read (Digest, xxxiv. 5, 20) of a "corpus cui coire licet," and of a "collegium dendrophorum Romanorum quibus ex senatus consulto coire licet" (Orelli, 4075), and "ut corpus quod appellatur neon . . . in civitate sua auctoritate amplissimi ordinis confirmetur" (at ¹ Cyzicus in Asia).

That there were at the time forbidden collegia existing in the Empire appears from the Digest

(xlvii. 22, 3), "collegia si qua fuerint illicita mandatis et constitutionibus et senatus consultis dissolvuntur," and the State seems to have stepped in whenever any improprieties showed themselves.

A specially strict watch was kept upon the religious unions which promoted the worship of foreign gods. The service of Isis, e.g., was controlled by the State under Augustus.¹ Tiberius exiled the Jews from Italy and showed himself very intolerant of foreign religions. "Externas cærimonias, Ægyptios Judaicosque ritus compescuit. Judæorum juventutem per speciem sacramenti in provincias gravioris cæli distribuit" (Sueton., Tib. 36), thus, temporarily at least, interfering with the remarkable toleration and forbearance which had been shown to the Jews since the days of Julius Cæsar.²

Caligula³ seemed to have given a good deal of freedom to the formation of collegia.

Claudius,⁴ on the other hand, showed great strictness against the hetæriæ, though without much success.

Nero, under the influence of Poppæa,¹ seems to have favoured the Jews, and is commonly supposed to have himself ²inaugurated at the Juvenalia the "collegia juvenum," which spread rapidly in the Roman country towns; but, on the other hand, he attacked and abolished under the Lex Julia certain collegia at Pompeii which were of seditious tendency.³

At this point a considerable gap occurs in the evidence; and this continues to the time of Trajan (A.D. 98-117).

This Emperor, though he had established a "collegium pistorum" at Rome,⁴ distinctly refused to sanction a "collegium fabrorum" in Nicomedeia on the ground that all such organisations, however originated, tended to become hetæriæ,⁵ i.e. social and political clubs, although the proposed membership was only 150, and Pliny guaranteed strict surveillance over it. And Trajan, while making some rare exceptions, lays down distinctly the principle "in ceteris civitatibus quæ nostro jure obstrictæ sunt res hujusmodi prohibenda est."¹

The evidence furnished by Pliny, in addition to the light which, as already shown (in chapter ii.), it throws on the immediate history of the Agapé, is interesting as indicating the general lines of policy towards collegia in the provinces at the time. Clearly the permission of collegia depended on the Emperor himself, and not on the governor, and this seems to have prevailed even in the case of the senatorial² provinces. This, and the severity of the penalty³ attached to illegal collegia—"quisquis illicitum collegium usurpaverit ea pœna tenetur qua tenentur qui hominibus armatis loca publica vel templa occupavisse iudicati sint"—points to the suspicion with which they were regarded, but does not necessarily prove that collegia were not already decidedly widespread.⁴

¹ Epist. 93; Ep. 96, 7 (referred to in chap. ii.).

² This was known as Auctoritas Augusti. In the case, e.g., of Bithynia, which was a senatorial province, the Emperor is consulted.

Under Hadrian (117-138 A.D.), certain privileges seem to have been given to the "collegia tenuiorum," as is seen by a comparison of the famous Lanuvian Inscription (A.D. 133), with the Digest (xlvii. 22, 1), as quoted above. The Inscription has "qui(bus) coire (co)nvenire collegiumq(ue) habere liceat qui stipem menstruam conferre volen(t in fun)era in mense c(oeant co)nferendi causa unde defuncti sepeliantur"; the Digest has "permittitur¹ tenuioribus stipem menstruam conferre dum tamen semel in mense cœeant."

The similarity of Tertullian's language in speaking of the Agapé to both these statements is too great to be accidental (Apologet. chap. xxxix.): "Etiam si quod arcæ genus est, non de honoraria summa quasi redemptæ religionis congregatur: modicam unusquisque stipem menstrua die vel cum velit, et si modo velit, et si modo possit, apponit, nam nemo compellitur, sed sponte confert . . . Nam inde non epulis nec potaculis nec ingratis voratrinis dispensatur, sed egenis alendis humandisque, et pueris et puellis re ac parentibus destitutis."

The technical¹ terms used such as "arca," "honoraria (?) summa," "stips," "menstrua die conferre," and the great resemblance to the words of the Digest, almost force one to the conclusion that Tertullian is referring to the further grants to the collegia tenuiorum by the rescript of Severus (A.D. 193-211), which the same passage in the Digest mentions: "permittitur tenuioribus . . . Quod non tantum in urbe sed in Italia et in provinciis locum habere Divus quoque Severus rescripsit. Sed religionis causa coire non prohibentur: dum tamen per hoc non fiat contra senatus consultum . . ."

But this is anticipating. Meantime, under Antoninus Pius (138-161 A.D.), the State control over the collegia was greatly increased, but they seem in some cases to have been impressed into the service² of the government.

Under Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 161-180) "collegia licita" were given legal rights, such as emancipation and receiving³ legacies, and the already existing restriction "non licet amplius quam unum collegium habere" (Dig. xlvii. 22, 1, 2) was reinforced.

² Cf. Corp. Inscr. vi. 1012 and ii. 1167.

³ Dig. xl. 3, 1; Dig. xxxiv. 5, 20.

Septimius Severus, in addition to the very important enactment already mentioned, added another against unlawful collegia:¹ "eos etiam qui illicitum collegium coisse dicantur apud præfectum urbi accusandos."

The decree of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235) by which "corpora omnium constituit vinariorum, lupinariorum, caligariorum et omnino omnium artium, atque ex sese defensoris dedit, et jussit qui, ad quos indices pertinent,"² has been already referred to. Liebenam (p. 49) thinks that this does not mean that Alexander gave a new constitution to these trade guilds, but that he simply developed further the policy of his predecessors in definitely connecting the work of such collegia with the public service of the Empire.

It is significant that from henceforward the expression "quibus ex senatus consulto coire licet" is no longer found.

For the next hundred years there is practically no important record of legislation touching collegia,³ but the general tendency was to bring them more completely under State control, while encouraging membership by the exemption of members from "sordida munera."⁴

Almost contemporary with the toleration of Christianity by the edict of Milan in 313 A.D. was a decree of Constantine, by which members of guilds, such as the "dendrophori," and "centonarii," and "fabri," should be united, and better provision for the State service thus gained.¹

The preceding outline of the Roman legislation as to collegia makes it clear that the Emperors were opposed to all spontaneous² developments in the way of association among the people at large. The Augustan legislation, which is naturally to be taken as the type of such procedure, not only abolished a large number of collegia, but required for the future that every collegium should receive a special licence from the Senate,³ the penalty of failure to do so being the same as that for majestas. This law appears gradually to have extended beyond the senatorial provinces.⁴

There is no evidence of the Christian Agapé being influenced by the restrictions of the earlier

² Though they encouraged their development when under their own supervision. Cf. Augustus' institution of the Augustales or Cultores Augusti. Ramsay, op. cit. xxxv.

Emperors. If, as there is reason¹ to think, the Roman Government were rather inclined to protect the Christians at first, one can imagine both the Eucharist and the Agapé being practised without molestation, more especially if the provisions mentioned in the Digest, xlvii., Tit. xxii., viz. "religionis causa coire non prohibentur," were already in force.

At this point the question naturally arises how far the Christian communities were identified with collegia or sodalicia. Leaving aside the question of the πρεσβύτεροι and ἐπίσκοποι, and the *præsidentes*² or patroni, who do not appear to have been officials distinctive of the collegia at all, it may be well to refer to the ingenuity which has been exercised in finding resemblances between the earliest Christian communities, especially the Corinthian, and the heathen associations.³ Expressions such as φιλοτιμεῖσθαι, ξῆλος, ξηλοῦν, κυροῦν, δοκιμάζειν, προθυμία, κατ' ἐπιταγὴν, καλῶς καὶ εὐσχημόνως, as well as ἀντιλήψεις, κυβερνήσεις, διακονία, have been quoted as instances of such resemblance, but with little evidence to support them.

³ See, e.g., Heinrici, Zeitschrift für wiss. Theol., 1876, p. 506 ff. And cf. Moeller, Hist. of the Church (Eng. Trans.), pp. 66, 67: "these cultus-associations . . . afforded a pattern after which those who believed in Christ might organise themselves."

But in addition to the terms already quoted from Tertullian, there were undoubtedly other points of contact between the early Christian communities and the collegia or θίασοι around them, although not such as to be clearly connected with the origin of the Agapé.¹

The word collegium itself seems to have been studiously avoided by the Christians;² but they designate themselves a "corpus Christianorum" (Tertull., Apol. chap. xxxix., Lactant. de morte persec. xlviii.), as "ordo" (Tertull., de Exhort. Cast. vii.), "ordo ecclesiasticus" (Tertull., de Monog. vii.); ἐκκλησία was used by the Greek associations (Corp. Inscrr. Gr. 2271, etc.); and συναγωγή, σύνοδος and τὸ κοινόν, are used by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 19 and vii. 32, 27) of the Christian Church. Lucian (de morte peregr. xi.) calls the president of the Christian community θιασάρχης καὶ συναγωγεὺς, as if of a θίασος, and Celsus (Origen c. Cels. iii. 22) speaks of

Christians as ἱδίοι θιασῶται of Jesus; and a Christian inscription in Africa speaks of "ecclesia fratrum, cultor, area, cella"—all familiar expressions in heathen collegia.¹

But in spite of these expressions, which may to some extent be only coincidences, or at any rate epithets used untechnically, there is no evidence to show how far the Christian communities were regarded as collegia before the time of Trajan. The Jews according to Josephus (Antiqq. Jud. xiv. 10, 6) were regarded as θιάσοι, but they were expressly exempted from the laws relating to collegia; the Christians, however, were not.² If, then, we are to seek an explanation of the apparent immunity of the Christian associations of the first age, it seems to be partly in the already quoted statements of the Digest—"religionis causa coire non prohibentur," partly in the fact, that amongst the enormous number of collegia to which extant inscriptions point as existing (in the face of the legal restrictions already quoted), the Christian meetings, which were still comparatively insignificant, might escape notice, especially as the administration of the laws relating to collegia seems to have been carried out with very varying strictness in different parts of the empire.¹ But as time went on, it is clear that certain features in Christianity would bring it into conflict with the Roman policy towards collegia. The Agapé, with its ἔρπνος or arca, would be perhaps the chief of these. In this they resembled the hetæriæ of which Trajan, e.g., was so suspicious in Bithynia; and occasion might always be found against them by a vigilant governor such as Pliny.²

² Tertullian repudiates the charge that the Christians took shelter under the wing of Judaism "sub umbraculo religionis certe licitæ" (Apologet. chap. xxxix.).

It is clear, as we have seen, that Trajan set his face against collegia, at anyrate in Bithynia; but how far this policy was extended, and how strictly it was enforced elsewhere it is impossible to tell; ³ so that the separation of the Agapé from the Eucharist may have taken place at different times in different provinces. All we know is that the exemption from the Lex Julia mentioned in the Digest (xlvi. 22) was not yet in force in Bithynia¹ in Pliny's time.

But by the time of Hadrian (A.D. 117-138) the privileges already mentioned had been extended to the collegia tenuiorum, at least in Rome itself and Italy, and possibly the senatorial provinces; and so it is quite possible that in Justin Martyr's time the Agapé² was held. His not dwelling on it might be due to a natural desire not to call the Emperor's attention to what had been till lately illegal, and was only lately tolerated.

When we come to Tertullian's time the whole case is altered. The wide indulgence of Severus' (A.D. 193-211) legislation towards the collegia tenuiorum was now recognised throughout the provinces; and Tertullian evidently seeks to put the Agapé under this category. Hence his employment of the familiar terminology¹ of the collegia, writing as he did shortly after the rescript of Severus.

² Cf. his expressions ὁμοδῖται, σύνεσμεν, etc., quoted in chap. ii. If it was not held, the repression would probably be due to the stricter administration of the Roman law in the West. Dr. Armitage Robinson thinks Justin's description "leaves no place for" the Agapé (Encycl. Biblica, s.v. Eucharist). Clement's silence seems hardly in point—he is silent about so many characteristic Christian practices. Cf. T. Harnack, op.c., p. 256.

"The Christians, in Tertullian's view, had the right to be regarded as 'licitæ factiones,' because their objects were the same, though with less admixture of luxury and social enjoyment, as those of the collegia tenuiorum.² Nor does there seem any reason to suppose that such a claim on the part of the Christian communities to be regarded in the eye of the law as a collegium tenuiorum would be disallowed by the authorities. Such a recognition would not in the slightest degree affect the general relations of the Christians and the Government: it was no recognition of Christians and Christianity. In all probability the Christians would describe themselves as 'fratres cultores dei,'³ or in some such way; at anyrate, the designation of Christiani, in the face of the name being a punishable offence, would be avoided. And therefore their position as a recognised or tolerated collegium would in no way prevent persecution 'for the name' or accusation under the law of majestas. It would merely give the various Christian communities a certain locus standi for their ordinary meetings; it would facilitate their combination for charitable purposes, making it more possible for them to approximate, without the suspicion of dangerous or anti-social communism, to their principle of having all things in common ('omnia indiscreta sunt apud nos'¹); and, finally, it would secure to them the right of common burial, and the possibility of possessing common burial places, which the vast system of catacombs round Rome proves to have been so essential an element of early Christianity. Indeed, the undoubted possession by the Christians at the end of the second century of *arcæ*¹ or cæmeteria of their own seems necessarily to imply that in some way or other they had corporate rights—that their communities ranked as juristic persons—a result which could only follow from their being generally or specially licensed.”²

¹ Tert., Apol. xxxix. Cf. Moeller, Church Hist. (Eng. Trans.), vol. i. p. 195: "The possibility of corporate rights and collective property for the Christians in the pre-Constantinian period consisted in their application to their own uses of the exceptions to the laws against Hetaireiai in favour of the so-called collegia tenuiorum; they therefore took the character of a sort of burial and charitable society. . . These latter were allowed to assemble once a month, but were nevertheless obliged to give notice to the authorities and give the names of the presidents. In this way, therefore, appeared . . . Christian collegia fratrum, which had their triclinia and also their burial places."

With this account of Tertullian’s claims on behalf of the Christian communities and their probable relation to the Imperial legislation on collegia the record is practically closed.

In the time of Clement of Alexandria the legislation of Alexander Severus³ had taken effect, and this may partly account for Clements’ frequent mention of the Agapé, which may now have been practically tolerated.

Origen’s comparative silence about the Agapé is very possibly due to the renewed feeling of hostility to Christians at the time that he wrote against Celsus (A.D. 249⁴); and his admission⁵ of the illegal character of the Agapé may perhaps be taken as referring to a period anterior¹ to the toleration of Severus to the collegia tenuiorum, and to the further enactments of Alexander Severus, which were no doubt in force in Origen's time.

³ Which seemed to give larger toleration than its wording implies. Cf. supra, pp. 98 and 191.

Theology

REGNUM DEI. THE BAMPTON LECTURES OF 1901. By A. ROBERTSON, D.D., Principal of King's College, London. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

This book is an endeavour to ascertain the meaning of the 'Kingdom of God' in its original prominence in the teaching of Christ. It reviews historically the main interpretations of this central idea in the successive phases of Christian tradition and life. Special attention is given to the sense in which St. Augustine identified the Church with the Kingdom of God. The later lectures follow out the alternative ideas of the Church, and of its relation to civil society which the Middle Ages and more recent types of Christian thought have founded upon alternative conceptions of the Kingdom of God.

The text of the Bible has been studied in the light thrown upon it by the best modern commentators; but the reasons for the conclusions stated are not left to be sought for in the commentaries, but are discussed in the course of the narrative. Much attention has been devoted to tracing the progress of religion amongst the Hebrews, and the book, which is furnished with maps, is further adapted to the needs of theological students by the addition of geographical notes, tables, and a full index.

The action covers a period of about three and thirty years; and deals with the experiences and adventures of an English country gentleman of an essentially normal type of character, subjected—owing to somewhat distressing antecedent circumstances—to very abnormal conditions of life. A ROMANCE OF TWO WORLDS. Twenty-Second Edition.

VENDETTA. Sixteenth Edition.

THELMA. Twenty-Fifth Edition.

ARDATH: THE STORY OF A DEAD SELF. Thirteenth Edition.

THE SOUL OF LILITH. Tenth Edition.

WORMWOOD. Eleventh Edition.

BARABBAS: A DREAM OF THE WORLD'S TRAGEDY. Thirty-sixth Edition.

'The tender reverence of the treatment and the imaginative beauty of the writing have reconciled us to the daring of the conception, and the conviction is forced on us that even so exalted a subject cannot be made too familiar to us, provided it be presented in the true spirit of Christian faith. The amplifications of the Scripture narrative are often conceived with high poetic insight, and this "Dream of the World's Tragedy" is a lofty and not inadequate paraphrase of the supreme climax of the inspired narrative.'—Dublin Review.

THE SORROWS OF SATAN. Forty-Fourth Edition.

'A very powerful piece of work. . . . The conception is magnificent, and is likely to win an abiding place within the memory of man. . . . The author has immense command of language, and a limitless audacity. . . . This interesting and remarkable romance will live long after much of the ephemeral literature of the day is forgotten. . . . A literary phenomenon . . . novel, and even sublime,'—W. T. STEAD in the Review of Reviews.

THE MASTER CHRISTIAN.

[160th Thousand.

'It cannot be denied that "The Master Christian" is a powerful book; that it is one likely to raise uncomfortable questions in all but the most self-satisfied readers, and that it strikes at the root of the failure of the Churches—the decay of faith—in a manner which shows the inevitable disaster heaping up. . . . The good Cardinal Bonpré is a beautiful figure, fit to stand beside the good Bishop in "Les Misérables" . . . The chapter in which the Cardinal appears with Manuel before Leo XIII. is characterised by extraordinary realism and dramatic intensity. . . . It is a book with a serious purpose expressed with absolute unconventionality and passion. . . . And this is to say it is a book worth reading.'—Examiner.
